David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is a fellow Labour and Co-operative Member, as, indeed, is my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith, who has done so much in this and the previous Parliament. Does he agree that, for employee commitment and all the other benefits that can come from employee share ownership, it is important for a broad-based ownership to arise from the use of such measures and any fiscal incentives? There is some evidence that ownership is sometimes restricted to the upper tiers of the employees—directors and others. There have also been some rather unfortunate activities, as in QinetiQ and elsewhere, which bring such activity into disrepute.

Mr. Hendrick: I totally agree. Indeed, I will propose that share ownership plans that provide facilities for wider participation, involving not just the big boys at the top in management, should receive tax advantages that other employee-owned trusts should not.

Research generally shows that employee financial participation on its own does not transform employee commitment or boost productivity. Improved commitment and productivity require three components from employers: financial participation, to which I have referred, a serious commitment to employee involvement, and some form of collective voice for employees. The significance of achieving a collective voice cannot be overemphasised. The current tax treatment of employee share schemes needs to be reformed to remove the barriers, so that some key means can be used for that collective voice, namely in the employee trusts.

Before I go into more detail, it is important to distinguish between the various types of share ownership that are available. First, there is direct share ownership, whereby workers own their shares individually. Secondly, there is indirect ownership, whereby shares are held by or for employees collectively in some form of trust. Direct or individual share ownership can give employees a real sense of owning a piece of the business. Indirect or collective ownership through a trust is, some would argue, even more important, as it provides the collective voice that is vital to the mix of the three components.

A trust may often offer the only affordable vehicle for achieving employee ownership in the first place and provides a secure block of shares that cannot be traded, which protects the business against instability or predators. Individual shareholdings, with uninfluential voting rights, do not in themselves create a strong basis for employee involvement. An employee trust with a significant shareholding adds that extra dimension. Trustees have to take into account the interests of beneficiaries. An employee trust provides a means of rewarding employees financially, and can deliver the necessary employee involvement and collective voice to ensure that the three key components boost productivity. An employee trust designed to benefit all employees in that way is less likely to be abused by the few.

However, various problems still loom. First, the employee trust structure is at a tax disadvantage as compared with the treatment of direct shareholdings. Most of the relevant tax incentives focus on direct—that is, individual—employee share ownership, which is only one of the components and the least likely to produce stable employee ownership. There is no corporation tax deduction for a company contributing to an employee trust if the trust retains those shares for the long-term benefit of staff. A previous deduction was removed in the Finance Act 2003, because Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs was trying to stop trusts being used for tax avoidance. It is important to make a distinction between trusts that are set up to benefit all employees in a company and those that are set up to benefit just one or two people—the fat cats.

[Mr. Hendrick]

There are no tax breaks at all for employee trusts with long-term shareholdings. There is also some complexity in the system, in that companies must have one trust to hold shares for any period and a SIP trust to distribute shares tax efficiently to employees. That is costly in both fees and time.

The SIP tax breaks are given if an employee agrees to keep his shares in a SIP trust for five years. That is considered by some to be too long to make employees wait before they can sell shares that they have bought as part of a SIP scheme, and it might be regarded as a reason not to buy shares in the first place. However, it can also be argued that if the period were to be less than five years, the investment might not be considered to be long term.

Returning to the benefits of tax breaks, existing law has various ways of trying to prevent abuse and target tax benefits. The SIP, for example, requires all employees to be offered participation, and to participate on similar terms. The EMI plan is available only to companies in certain qualifying trades with gross assets of £30 million or less. Any change must be carefully focused to avoid abuse.

What changes are needed? My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General should consider the likely impact of shortening the SIP waiting time, before which employees who have bought shares under the scheme can sell them, to less than five years. That might encourage share ownership generally. I would not like the five-year rule to be abolished if the result is that things do not work so well in terms of wider share ownership and the SIP scheme, which has been a considerable success.

Consideration should also be given to the statutory recognition of an acceptable—in tax avoidance terms—form of employee trust, contributions to which are tax deductible even if shares are held indefinitely in the trust. That is to say that there would be no corporation tax on money that an employer put into that trust. The trust structure could be simplified so that a single trust could hold shares for a long period, and easily and efficiently distribute shares to employees. There is a way to achieve both those aims in a manner that focuses on the tax break and avoids abuse, by building on the tax break introduced by the 2002 Act.

The Government accept that if a stake of at least 10 per cent. is bought by a SIP trust from individual shareholders, the company financing the purchase can get a tax deduction, and the SIP trust can take up to 10 years to distribute the shares to employees. There is also a suggestion from JOL that the 10-year requirement be removed for a defined class of eligible companies. The defined class could be based on the EMI qualifying company tests in order to show its availability. In that way, eligible companies would get a tax deduction for shares bought and held permanently in the SIP trust. The SIP is an approved plan and so is subject to Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs scrutiny, again to prevent abuse. Many would argue that if such tax breaks were created within the SIP legislation a company would need only one employee trust—a SIP trust—to hold shares for a long period and to distribute them to employees.

I propose setting up what I would call an employees direct unit to deliver and promote the productivity benefits of employee share ownership. It would raise the Government's profile in relation to employee ownership, through both the number of companies that introduce the SIP and the way in which they operate it. Companies that follow Government guidelines and what I would call best practice, and introduce employee ownership alongside true participation, will be more likely to achieve enhanced productivity.

Government support for the introduction of the SIP, through the offices of the Inland Revenue, is based only on the financial aspects of the scheme in the form of tax relief. The problem with that is that companies will continue to regard tax relief as the main purpose of the scheme and will pass that message on to their employees. Only enlightened and committed companies will seek to introduce complementary participation schemes; hence the need for the employees direct unit, which would deliver and promote the productivity benefits of employee share ownership schemes.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend mentions the potential benefits of employee participation. He makes an elegant and persuasive Budget submission, even at this late date. Does he agree that to achieve one of the benefits of employee share ownership—more tranquil industrial relations, which has generally been obtained where employee share ownership has been widespread—employee participation is vital? It is much more than just a fiscal incentive. If people feel part of and valued by an organisation, the former tension between management and work force will be replaced by something more positive.

Mr. Hendrick: I totally agree. We need to change the culture and the way in which business operates. Instead of there being a them and us between management and work force, there needs to be a culture of involvement and participation, and the democratisation of the workplace. Only by giving the employee a stake in that enterprise—

David Taylor: A voice.

Mr. Hendrick: And a voice. Only then will that be engendered. Schemes should be seen not just as providing a tax break or—some would say—a tax dodge, but as a means of enabling a new culture to permeate the British workplace. If the Government were to set up such a unit, to work alongside the Inland Revenue, they would play a great part in promoting that culture.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Does he think that his latest proposal would be appropriate if applied, for example, to the Post Office?

Mr. Hendrick: I am being asked to tread on some controversial ground. I would not want to comment on any specific business. All I would say is that if that culture were to permeate business, the biggest benefit would be to private business and publicly owned companies. While there is scope for that, it would need to be considered in a different light.

The Government cannot hope to reap the maximum reward of improved productivity if they do not provide clear, constructive advice to companies and organisations on what we regard as best practice in the implementation and operation of employee ownership schemes. They are being too optimistic if they believe that a scheme can be introduced on a purely financial basis, and succeed. The introduction and operation of such schemes in any company is a complex process, which depends for its success on effective communication, ongoing provision of information and a clear commitment to the concept of partnership across the organisation. We cannot assume that companies will automatically understand that without the information, clear guidance and examples of best practice that the Government could give. If companies are left to learn by experience, their enjoyment of the benefits of employee ownership might be delayed or not fully realised.

If the Government wish to reap the greatest productivity rewards from employee ownership, they should be proactive and should, from the outset, provide advice and assistance to companies on human resource-based policies that will enhance the introduction of the SIP and establish a participation audit for the operation of such schemes. Therefore, I request that a new dedicated unit be established to work alongside the Revenue on the non-financial aspects of employee ownership: collating research, information and case studies on best practice, providing training for employee trustees, and, if thought fit, establishing a code of conduct for all companies that wish to participate in the SIP.

The Government should consider giving statutory recognition to an acceptable form of employee trust, contributions to which would be tax deductible even if shares were retained indefinitely in that trust. Such a trust could benefit from other tax advantages to promote employee ownership, such as an exemption from the loans to the participators' provisions and other measures to remove the barriers that I mentioned and even to encourage such trusts.

I acknowledge the positive steps taken by the Government to foster employee share ownership, and the need to prevent and address tax avoidance, but my proposals merit serious consideration. I respectfully ask the Paymaster General to let Treasury officials consider them to see whether they could supplement and enhance the Government's approach to the wider encouragement of employee share ownership schemes.

9.51 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD):I welcome the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) to the Chamber and thank him for securing a debate on this important subject, which perhaps does not get the discussion and analysis it deserves. It is useful to point out at the outset that although worker share ownership has been described in a generic way, we are talking about different philosophies and approaches. On the one hand, we have worker, co-operative type structures that are all-inclusive, equitable and have one philosophy. On the other hand, as the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) reminded us, there are share option schemes of the kind that are common in the United States, which are designed to remunerate highly paid management employees and are highly exclusive. Such schemes have a completely different philosophy and different consequences. When we talk about worker share ownership, we need to be clear that there is a wide continuum of different kinds of animals.

There is a long history behind such schemes. The idea is not new and has been through many changes over the years. I was born and grew up in the city of York, and my parents worked in the Rowntrees and Terry's factories, where the idea of worker share ownership has been around for generations—when the divvy came was always a talking point in the family. The concept has been embedded for a long time. Whatever their other consequences, such schemes created much better labour relationships. There were rarely any industrial disputes at Rowntrees or Terry's, as there was a sense of involvement. However, it shaded into paternalism; that is one aspect of the schemes about which the trade union movement has been nervous over the years.

The development of worker share ownership had a burst of life with the intellectual debate in the 1960s, when people were looking for middle ways between socialism and raw capitalism. Certainly, people in the liberal tradition argued strongly for that model. However, it was criticised by at least sections of the trade union movement on two grounds, the first of which was that it blunted what were, in many cases, clear divisions of interest between owners of capital and workers—although that may not have been right, politically. The more serious and practical objection, which is relevant to this day, was that it increased the risks to workers. They are always at risk of losing their jobs, and occupational pension schemes if they are tied to a particular employer. It was thought that those who owned shares were exposed to an additional, highly concentrated risk. That downside has been widely understood over the years.

The next stage at which worker share ownership had a new lease of life was in the early 1980s, when people were looking for alternatives to the incomes policy of trying to get the work force to appreciate the problems associated with the profitability of companies, and to moderate pay claims. There was a strong stream of thinking led, I think, by Sam Brittan of the Financial Times, which Nigel Lawson, or Lord Lawson as he now is, took up when he was Chancellor, to encourage worker share ownership, with one of the objectives being to moderate pay claims. There was a different element in the argument. I make those points to stress that different people have come at this subject for different reasons over quite a long period.

The hon. Member for Preston rightly wanted to concentrate on the advances made in the period of Labour Government. He rightly said that there has been a big step forward in enlarging worker share ownership. There is also the separate system of share save, which is about taking options rather than taking shares. It reduces the risk but might be less remunerative. There are different models even within the current arrangement that the Government have introduced. A large number of companies are now involved. Some 6,400 have a form of employee share ownership, and the total business is about £20 billion a year. We are talking about substantial amounts.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

I shall trespass on the rather sensitive question of how we take this matter forward, as raised by the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). The Government could use their few remaining publicly owned assets to develop share ownership. The sensitive subject of the Post Office has been touched on, and I shall touch on it again, because we raised it at our party conference this weekend.

We have adopted a model for the Post Office that would involve selling 49 per cent. of Post Office shares to employees and small investors, and dividing the remaining 51 per cent. equally between a state golden share and a John Lewis-type partnership. We argued for that because previous attempts to use privatisation as a way of developing worker share ownership foundered in the case of the National Freight Corporation, in which the people who were given shares quickly disposed of them in the secondary market. It simply became another private company and any sense of employee involvement was lost. The way to get around that would be to have a John Lewis trust model, whereby the shares are kept within a trust structure that is not diluted. That is the best way of keeping the motivation.

David Taylor: The hon. Gentleman describes his party's U-turn on the Post Office over the weekend. Does he believe that such an arrangement would soothe industrial relations between the Post Office's management and work force, which are notoriously fractious, although they have been quieter in the past year or two?

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that relations are notoriously fractious. My experience is that there is a particular problem in the large postal sorting offices in London, but that in some of the smaller operations, such as the one in south-west London, where I am the local MP, relations are very good. I have always found the representatives of the work force there with whom I have dealt constructive, although they have rejected the option that we suggest because they think that it would open the way to what they see as the wrong kind of privatisation. That is a legitimate point of view, but we think that if it were done in the right way, it would do exactly what he wants: increase motivation and involvement.

The other way in which the Government could advance the situation is through the tax regime. We need to consider seriously two proposals made by the hon. Gentleman. The first is the suggestion that we restrict tax privileges in certain areas to schemes with which there is a genuine model of participation and involvement, rather than share option schemes of the QinetiQ type model, with which there are elements of serious abuse. I have secured a debate to discuss that in an hour or so. If such privileges can be narrowed to areas of genuine participation, that would be more appropriate and less costly to the Treasury.

The hon. Member for Preston's other proposal went in the opposite direction: that we should enlarge tax privileges to be sympathetic to trust arrangements. That is a good suggestion. I do not know what it would cost—perhaps the Paymaster General will tell us—but the concept seems right. It is unfortunate that because of measures to prevent tax evasion or avoidance by unscrupulous operators, good schemes such as those provided by John Lewis, Ove Arup and the Bader Foundation have found themselves at a disadvantage. It would be helpful to find a way around that.

The final point that I want to make is that not only a lot of anecdotes but a lot of research have come out of the United States, among other places, where there are good and well conceived worker share ownership schemes linked to participation. Empirical evidence shows that that does a lot to improve productivity and motivation. Common sense would suggest that that would be the outcome.

David Taylor: The hon. Gentleman cites the example of the United States of America. Would he care to speculate on the spectacular problems encountered by United Airlines, where the majority of shares were owned within such frameworks?

Dr. Cable: There are risks with such schemes. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, much of the airline industry in the United States is bankrupt and there are risks as well as benefits associated with worker share ownership. That is why people putting all their eggs in one basket, with workers having almost all their asset wealth in shares in their own company, is not sensible. However, it is almost certainly sensible for them to have some involvement. As I suggested, research shows that the outcome is generally positive.

My final point repeats one made by the hon. Member for Preston. In order for worker share ownership to be broadly accepted and to gather wide political support, it has to be seen to be genuine and not simply an excuse for the kind of share option schemes that we have seen in some companies which have involved serious abuse.

10.1 am

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) on securing the debate, which raises important issues about how we should align the interests of the work force and employees with the interests of the owners of a business. One reason why we have share option schemes is to strengthen that alignment of interests so that both employees and shareholders work in the same direction to strengthen the business and bring about its goals. That is an important reason why so many share option schemes are available.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said that there are 6,400 share schemes. It is interesting to break that down and consider their availability. Just over 1,000 all-employee share schemes are available. A good proportion are in listed companies, so that 93 of the FTSE 100 and 160 of the FTSE 250 have all-employee share schemes. If we compare the number of all-employee share schemes with the number of discretionary share option schemes, we start to see the difference opening up. Although there are 1,000 all-employee share schemes, there are more than 6,300 discretionary share option schemes, predominately among unlisted, private companies. If we are to align the interests of shareholders and employees, it is important that we also take into account the number of unlisted companies with share schemes as well as the number of listed companies.

The hon. Member for Preston waxed lyrical on the benefits of aligning ownership and employment. I am surprised that he did not grip with more enthusiasm the suggestion from my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) that the model that he outlined should be applied to the Post Office. The hon. Gentleman was somewhat reticent in identifying the way in which the interests of postal employees could be aligned with those of management by introducing an element of employee share ownership. I am sure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry would be interested in considering the ideas that he has put forward, in order to introduce such a congruence of interests in the Post Office. Perhaps we would see a continued improvement in industrial relations if that were to continue.

There is a reluctance at times from the collective voice of employees—the trade unions—to embrace employee share ownership. The hon. Member for Twickenham referred to the National Freight Corporation and the way in which employees sold their shares in the secondary market. I also understand that the trade unions representing those employees were reluctant to encourage employees to take up the ownership of shares in the corporation.

The subject is important and we need to recognise the continuum of interest. There are businesses that are happy to ensure that a share option scheme forms part of the remuneration of their employees and to encourage the identification of a common interest, but there are those who want to move further down the route referred to by the hon. Member for Preston, where share ownership is allied with more formal participation and a collective voice on the way in which the company is run. Many businesses will go for the share option scheme and will be able to introduce that, but will not go down the route of greater employee involvement. Businesses in my constituency, particularly the smaller businesses that might not have employee share option schemes, find ways to ensure that employees are engaged with the business. They have regular consultations about the productivity and profitability of the business, and try to encourage input from employees. They do not necessarily need to go down the route of share ownership to have that involvement in the way in which the business is run.

I was slightly concerned by the direction in which the hon. Gentleman was heading when he talked about the employees direct unit. I was not sure whether he was suggesting that it would be a precondition of tax incentives for employee share ownership to have greater participation in the running of the business. He talked about participation orders, which sound quite expensive. I am not sure who would fund the participation order—the business or the taxpayer. We would need to consider that.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to a code of conduct being required for businesses with share options and share ownership schemes. Again, it was not clear whether that code of conduct would be compulsory and whether employers who did not wish to set up some mechanism for employee share owners to have a collective voice would be forced to go down that route. We need to be careful that in trying to promote the goal of one distinct model of employee share ownership and participation through the combination of the three conditions to which the hon. Gentleman referred—financial participation, employee involvement and collective voice—all employee share schemes do not cease to be attractive to employers as a means of remuneration. I was not sure where he was heading, and whether he wanted a voluntary or compulsory scheme. Perhaps he would like to elaborate.

Mr. Hendrick: I was not trying to be prescriptive with any formula for any particular company. I was trying to give an impression and idea of what needs to be involved, so that we can move towards a generalised model that would allow participation, give a voice and be financially beneficial to the companies and employees by providing tax incentives and tax breaks. I would not say that anything should be conditional on a code of conduct, but such a code would be strongly advised if companies want any of the schemes that they may wish to operate to succeed.

Mr. Hoban: I am sure that I and others will be reassured that the hon. Gentleman meant a voluntary scheme. That would remove some of the disincentives that might arise if codes of conduct and participation orders became compulsory or even strongly advised. They could act as a disincentive for employers who wish to introduce employee share schemes. It is important to consider that. We would not want to see a decrease in the number of employee share schemes.

The hon. Gentleman identified a means by which the effectiveness of the beneficial impact of such schemes on businesses might be increased, but I do not think that we should be forced to go down a particular route to maximise the benefit. There are a range of reasons why businesses would introduce share option schemes, and they are not necessarily all of the model that he identified.

Following a significant expansion in the number of share option schemes, approval of such schemes is starting to tail off. It is interesting that 120 save-as-you-earn schemes were approved in 1999–2000 but that that fell to 38 in 2003–04. It might be argued that that was a consequence of the introduction of the share incentive plan, but there again the number of plans that have been approved has fallen from 220 in 2001–02 to 95 in 2003–04.

An issue therefore arises about the take-up of those schemes and the number of businesses that want to establish new schemes, particularly given the large gap between the number of all-employee share schemes, which is just over 1,000, and discretionary schemes, at just over 6,300. We need to continue to consider the matter and to find new ways of encouraging employee share ownership, to bring about greater alignment between the interests of employees and shareholders. I am sure that the House and the Government will return to the topic.

10.11 am

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hendrick) on securing this important debate. From the comments made by the hon. Members for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), there appears to be agreement across Parliament on the importance of providing for employee share ownership, notwithstanding the need to consider safeguards in ensuring that the schemes achieve their objectives, as mentioned by my hon. Friend.

I want to reinforce the important points that my hon. Friend made about the importance of share ownership: it gives financial participation; it can bring about a commitment from employees and employers in partnership; and it can, if other arrangements are established, give a collective voice not only to employees but to everyone who wants their business to prosper. I recognise the contribution not only of my hon. Friend, but of those who have been involved for a considerable time in the development of policies on employee-owned businesses. That has contributed to a rich and important debate not only in Parliament but in the country. I particularly want to mention the Co-operative parliamentary group, which continues to make important contributions.

The Government have shown their commitment to employee share ownership with the introduction in 2000 of two extremely generous schemes to encourage employees to take a stake in their employer, as my hon. Friend said. They have both been mentioned: the share incentive plan and the enterprise management incentive. In addition, the save-as-you-earn and company share option plans are also available. The SIP plan incorporates specific provisions to enable mutually owned co-operatives to enter into a plan.

In 2002, the Government and the House collaborated with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on his private Member's Bill, the Employee Share Schemes Bill, which enabled companies to obtain "up-front" corporation tax relief on money given to a share incentive plan trust to buy a larger block of shares. The 2002 Act enshrined in legislation the right to elect worker shareholders as trustees of share incentive plan trusts. That was followed by legislation in 2003 to provide employers with the certainty of a statutory route to a corporation tax deduction for the cost of their employee share schemes.

Reference has been made to the scale of participation. I take in the spirit in which they were intended—of wanting to build on something important—the points made by the hon. Member for Fareham about the number of schemes being registered now. However, more than 4 million employees—nearly 20 per cent of private sector employees—are participating in tax-advantaged schemes. In 2004, more than 6,000 companies were operating tax-advantaged schemes and more than 1,000 were open to all employees. The share incentive plan has become the most popular tax-advantaged all-employee share scheme ever, with nearly 3.9 million people buying shares in 2003–04. There could be many explanations for our reaching the point that we are at, but it is not a lack of popularity, or, currently, lack of participation.

The fact that the schemes are tax advantaged means that the employees benefit from about £710 million in income tax and national insurance contributions relief on shares and share option gains in 2003–04. That is very significant and generous support by any international standards for participation in the schemes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Preston referred to Job Ownership Ltd., and I want to return to that subject. It is important to establish how well the schemes have gone before we begin to consider how to improve them. A recent report published by Job Ownership Ltd called "Shared Company: how employee share ownership works" comments:

> "Largely thanks to HM Treasury's determination to make employee shareholding a serious element in corporate governance, the UK now leads at least its European competitors in both the degree of meaningful employee financial participation, and in the scale of our employee owned business sector ".

We must not be complacent, but that is an important milestone. I was interested in the points made about the need to continue to engage in dialogue to see how we can continue to take things forward, and I should like to deal with some of the specific points that my hon. Friend and the hon. Members for Twickenham and for Fareham made.

The first point that my hon. Friend made was about a major awareness campaign. He mentioned it several times, including when he referred to the employee unit. I was not clear what the role of Government might be in that context. The remit of a number of industry-sponsored organisations includes considering the wider benefits. Perhaps he felt that if things were left to Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs the focus might be only on tax advantage, whereas there are wider advantages. I took that point, although the hon. Member for Fareham rightly picked up on whether he had in mind a complex scheme. I took my hon. Friend's point in its broadest sense of whether a unit with the role of advocacy on a wider basis, without compulsion, would be appropriate.

The Government already participate in the arena of discussion of employee share ownership. I do not have a view, particularly, on whether a unit of the kind in question is necessary, what it would do, where it would fit, or whether it would bring a benefit, and the hon. Member for Fareham made a relevant point about increasing awareness and thus application. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs does participate in a series of what are called "employer talk" events around the country, at which officials not only talk to business about employee share schemes, and raise awareness, but discuss the wider benefits. The approach of my hon. Friend the Member for Preston is interesting, although a lot of work would need to be done on it. However, I am happy, as always, to tell people, including those outside the House who advocate such an approach and who have a contribution to make on improving schemes, that speaking to officials at HMRC who deal with such issues is an important first step. I do not know exactly what that would entail, or whether it would be appropriate, but I am happy to take such representations to my officials.

I would also need to be sure that we were adding something. We need to have a view of the current situation and of why employees and employers take up share ownership schemes. What do they feel the benefits are? What are the major drivers and how might we measure them? Is there a gap in understanding or can more be said about productivity and participation? If so, what is the appropriate unit? I am a Treasury

Minister, and before Treasury Ministers agree to spend money, they need to be assured that there is a purpose to doing so and that there will be an outcome.

Mr. Hendrick: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many people believe that the SIP scheme and other schemes are a means of giving financial advantage to the share ownership? As I said, participation and a collective voice would go a lot further towards promoting such schemes and making them more successful. If she agrees, would she also accept that the Government could facilitate that process, if not through the unit that I suggested, then through the Department of Trade and Industry or HMRC?

Dawn Primarolo: I was coming to SIPs, but I would make one point to my hon. Friend, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Twickenham. Share ownership schemes, by themselves, might not be enough to achieve all the objectives that my hon. Friend identified. I think that everyone who has spoken would agree on that. We need to consider other changes in the workplace, as well as attitudes to partnership and involvement in the workplace. That will need to involve not only employees, but management, which takes me back to his point.

SIPs are the largest schemes; they are all-employee and very successful, and a lot of taxpayer's money is invested in the SIP principle through reliefs. A review of SIPs is under way, and internal research contractors have been engaged to carry out detailed research into employees' and employers' use of SIPs and to evaluate the policy's impact. On the financial side, we know from the sheer numbers that take-up is very high, but we need to look at the wider issues. That research will be published in due course, although I do not have a date for that. Like today's debate, that would be an appropriate time for anybody with ideas for improving schemes, and particularly SIPs, which have been the major issue this morning, to put those ideas forward.

Specifically on SIPs and trusts, the Government are not against including mutual or trust-owned businesses in a SIP if the right way of doing so can be found. My officials and I will continue to consider proposals from trusts, employee-owned companies and mutually owned organisations, but any arrangement would need to meet the Government's aim of linking employees' effort and commitment with outcomes such as productivity, a voice, participation and performance, as my hon. Friend said.

Regrettably, there are those who, regardless of Parliament's intent, seek to use tax reliefs, including even those that apply in this area, in ways that were not intended. Given that experience, there is always a precautionary principle. As a Minister, therefore, I am somewhat reluctant to go beyond what is offered now until the case for doing so is absolutely established. However, where companies allow their employees to hold a real stake through direct shareholdings, and that is done in conjunction with wider, good employee participation measures, there is evidence that the company's productivity and performance will improve. The Government's tax advantage schemes are a good basis on which to align treatment of such issues.

My hon. Friend also mentioned trusts, which involve complex issues. Companies have a choice about which structure to use. When the Government offer a complete scheme, we cannot go into all the vagaries, reflecting what every company might like: we offer a general scheme, and companies have a choice about which structure to use. Some use SIPs with tax breaks, and others use a trust, including a SIP trust that involves tax breaks. I agree that that is more complicated. If we add two trusts to a financial and legal chain, it is bound to be more complicated, but that is the company's choice. Perhaps we need to consider that.

As I said, however, it is a sad fact of life that employee benefit trusts can be used to enable employers and employees to avoid paying their proper share of tax and national insurance on employment reward. The problem takes many forms. An employer might offer an employee a way of apparently earning less, but in fact getting more. It might reduce the employee's tax and national insurance liability, and the individual will go for it because it makes economic sense. When everything is unwound through the system, and the mechanisms that are used are identified, particularly by the tax authorities, it is then suggested that that was not actually the intention.

My hon. Friend referred to the changes in 2003, which ensure that companies get corporation tax relief where the employee reward is in share-based form and is properly subject to tax and national insurance. I am sorry to say that any change must still fit in with those changes. There have been repeated discussions across the board, including with established and good companies, such as the John Lewis Partnership and its advisers, which have sought a proposal allowing them to put in place new arrangements. However, there have been difficulties at every stage, and the tax authorities immediately felt uncomfortable, not about the intention of those who made the proposals, but about the possibility that others outside that circle would be able to use the relief in ways that we could not allow.

The five-year rule for SIPs was part of the consultation that took place before they were set up. All the advice was that five years was a reasonable period for which to give employees a stake in a business and for employees to have a voice in the choices that influenced that business, as opposed to having a tax-reduced way of receiving employment income. That is why we have five years. We should wait to see what the research says, but I have seen nothing advocating that five years is an unreasonable period. Of course, the shares can be removed between three and five years, but a different regime applies in that respect.

I referred to Job Ownership Ltd., as did my hon. Friend. He will know that the Chancellor spoke at its conference last year and that representatives from that organisation have met officials to discuss share ownership through a trust structure. I have said that we are committed to listening to such ideas and that if we can find a way, and if proposals come forward that meet with his agreement—it depends on whether they cost a lot of money or not and there might be other priorities—we are prepared to take them forward.

On the Royal Mail, I have only two things to say on Government policy. First, other people can say what their policy is, but the Government have no plans to privatise or part-privatise the Royal Mail. Secondly, however, as the hon. Member for Fareham said, it does not need to be privatised or part-privatised for those within the organisation to favour some form of employee share scheme. I understand that some are in favour and that the Department of Trade and Industry is willing to consider such a scheme. Again, that depends on the proposals. Let us not suggest that the Royal Mail has to be privatised to get share ownership. That is, rightly, a commitment that can be achieved, as others have said.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. I am heartened, and I hope that he will be, that this might just be the first debate on employee share ownership in which all three political parties present—the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats and Labour—have talked about making a commitment to it. We are clearly saying that it must be done in a structured and not overly complex way that protects the taxpayer from its being used inappropriately. It should enhance employee participation and voice, create improvements in productivity and give them an important stake.

Leaving aside the fact that my hon. Friend now has my agreement to go away to examine a number of things, he should be congratulated on, and heartened by, the fact that at last we have reached the point at which the political parties are agreed that this is the way forward. That must surely lead to a blossoming in the future development of employee share ownership.

Competitiveness (Northern Ireland)

11 am

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate an issue that is crucial to the future of Northern Ireland. I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), for attending today. She is a very busy lady and I appreciate her giving her time to be here. She is one of the direct rule Ministers who pays a lot of attention to Northern Ireland and is dedicated to it—so she tells me.

The economic competitiveness of any region is of immense importance to its people, their standards of living, their ability to care for the weakest members of society, the upbringing of their children and their ability to provide for their own retirement. Northern Ireland is a small regional economy within the UK economy, similar to but smaller than Wales, north-east and north-west England. It accounts for 2.9 per cent. of the people of the United Kingdom and just 2.6 per cent. of its expenditure. Northern Ireland's economy has experienced severe strains over recent decades, not through any lack of inventiveness on the part of its citizens or any lack of ambition on the part of its business community, but because it was directly and systematically targeted by terrorists, who calculated that, by planting bombs, setting fires, threatening business men and extorting money from them, they could not only terrorise the community, but destabilise the economy, make Northern Ireland less attractive to potential investors and thereby cripple the entire society.

Undoubtedly, inward investment and business growth were hindered during the years of intense terrorist campaigns. The provincial towns, as I am sure the Minister would agree, were more badly hit than other areas. They were attacked by the bombs, fires or whatever. It has been difficult. None was more affected than my own constituency. Lurgan town was badly affected by bombs, little money was put into the infrastructure and it needs a lot of investment. I would appreciate it if the Minister used her influence with the other Ministers involved, so that some money was poured in to help the regeneration company, Lurgan Forward, which has done tremendous work over the past 10 years but needs Government help and funding to push it forward.

The Government's response has been to prioritise inward investment, and help to keep society stable and the economy moving by enlarging the public sector. Consequently, and for understandable reasons, our public sector has significantly outgrown the private sector. In recent months, the competitiveness of our economy has come under more subtle pressure, thanks in no small part to the comments of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who, while in America, said that the Northern Ireland economy was unsustainable, despite the fact that the single biggest factor in deciding whether a potential investor comes to Northern Ireland, or locates in the Irish Republic, is not in the control of anyone in Northern Ireland, but is the Secretary of State's responsibility. I refer to the level of corporation tax, which is entirely in the remit of Government and which, in comparison with that of our nearest competitor to the south, has a detrimental impact on our economy. I have raised that matter in the House and we shall return to it later in this debate. However, for the moment, I make it clear that, if any chief executive of any commercial enterprise said the things about its products or the company that the Secretary of State said about the Northern Ireland economy—especially if it related to a matter pertaining exclusively to his own responsibilities in his post—he would very quickly find himself on gardening leave. Business people, politicians and civic leaders were busy trying to promote Northern Ireland, but our Government were busy chipping away with a pick axe at our economic bedrock.

For the Secretary of State to say what he did in America, of all places—the biggest source of foreign direct investment in Northern Ireland—was particularly ill judged and damaging. It was carelessness of a kind that no community should have to experience and it also ignored certain key facts. Northern Ireland gross domestic product growth has equalled or outperformed the UK average since the mid to late 1990s and manufacturing output has outperformed the UK average since the late 1990s. Output grew by 2.3 per cent. between quarter four of 2003 and quarter four of 2004, compared with 0.6 per cent. on the mainland, with proportionately fewer job losses than in the UK. Employment is at a record high, with 10,830 jobs created in the last 12 months. Unemployment is at a 26-year low and has been below 5 per cent. for 43 consecutive months. Northern Ireland is currently the fourth best performing of the 12 UK regions.

Despite all the turmoil, violence and death visited upon the Province by terrorist organisations, Northern Ireland's people continued year on year to prove the lie of a former Prime Minister, who described them as "spongers". The resilience, inventiveness, and dogged iron will of its people not to let adversity overcome them convinces me that, given the proper opportunity, business in Northern Ireland can prove to be as good, if not better, than anywhere in the British Isles. But it must be given a fair opportunity.

Despite the Secretary of State's comments on these matters, he has identified certain things that are relevant to today's debate. Northern Ireland's apparent strong performance conceals underlying structural weaknesses, which are well documented. Although we do not have the time to go into those in full detail today, they can be summarised as follows: an underdeveloped private sector; an over-dependence on the public sector; low levels of business formation and research and development spend; low participation in the labour market; high long-term unemployment; uneven sub-regional growth; and the £5 billion annual subvention from GB, which I agree is not sustainable. To that could be added the demographic time bomb of 40,400 people going into the work force in the next decade. On that measure alone, Northern Ireland needs 4,400 new jobs annually just to stand still. If we add to that the Government targets on civil service reductions and the indications in relation to the economically inactive, we shall need 141,000 new jobs by 2015 just to stand still.

As can be seen from all that, we are still facing major economic challenges. The Secretary of State has drawn attention to the need to transform Northern Ireland from a public sector-reliant economy to a highly efficient and competitive private sector-led economy. We in my party agree and are keen to discover what steps he has taken to date, what he proposes to do to facilitate that transformation, over what time scale and what the annual targets are for that transformation. Perhaps the Minister will outline some of those things for us today.

Government cannot do the job of business, but must create the conditions in which business can compete and win. It should be clear, from the challenges Northern Ireland faces that I have outlined, that only a managed transition from the current public sector domination to a private sector-led economy will work. I place on record my request that that managed approach be the Government's approach to that crucial task. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that.

Steep tax increases with sharp reductions in public expenditure will stall the economy, already overwhelmingly dependent on historic levels of Government support, and may impact on political and security stability. Managed transition requires steady private sector expansion, continued growth in foreign direct investment, growth in indigenous businesses and increased entrepreneurship.

It should be clear to all that the Government must commit to a privatisation programme, including significant transfers of both service and estate from the public sector. However, they must also pledge that any revenues accrued through such a programme will remain in Northern Ireland by way of investment in our infrastructure, help for new private sector initiatives and assistance for research and development. Again, will the Minister deal with that?

Increasing Northern Ireland's competitiveness will demand the following: a world-class infrastructure, which could be partly funded by a radical programme of privatisation; ring-fencing and reinvesting the proceeds of privatisation to fund new investment and to alleviate excessive long-term debt; and transparent funding of the £14.7 billion investment strategy for Northern Ireland to prevent the Government from mortgaging future generations in Northern Ireland. Will the Minister commit to those essentials today?

I turn to corporation tax. Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom with a land border with another European state. That brings significant challenges. Not only are we neighbours to another European country, but that country continues to invest massively in infrastructure and, even more importantly, it has a corporation tax rate of 12.5 per cent. According to the former chief executive of the Irish Development Agency:

> "In the battle to attract overseas investment to Ireland, no financial weapon has been more important than tax in convincing new industry to locate here. It remains the IDA's unique selling point, giving Ireland a critical advantage in winning new investment."

The most basic economic analysis indicates what a massive advantage such a low corporation tax rate brings. The number of international businesses with European headquarters in the Republic of Ireland is a testament to that. Almost no matter what else we do in Northern Ireland, while the corporation tax rate differential remains at the present rate, it will be virtually impossible to compete with the Republic of Ireland.

Through parliamentary questions, I have sought repeatedly to get the Government even to acknowledge that corporation tax is a factor, but all to no avail. It is clear from my earlier quote that the Irish Treasury, which has been the biggest beneficiary of the different rates of corporation tax, is aware of the significance of that difference, even if the Treasury in the UK, which has been the loser, claims not to recognise it.

The stark reality remains, and it is known by the Government, even if thus far there has been a steadfast refusal to say so openly. Corporation tax has been, if I might coin a phrase, the tax that dare not speak its name. Over the years, pleas for a lower corporation tax rate for Northern Ireland have been made by all parties and dismissed by the Treasury. Those of us who are familiar with the issue are aware of the arguments routinely employed as to why a different corporation tax rate is not possible for Northern Ireland, and we may hear some of them repeated by the Minister today. However, such a change is possible. It is a only matter of will.

It cannot be that the Government are concerned by the loss of a portion of the very modest corporation tax generated in Northern Ireland. The loss of revenue from the reduction in corporation tax that we propose would amount to approximately £350 million, which would be more than offset by increased revenues from new jobs. Indeed, as part of any reduction, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could put in place new job targets for the first and second year. That would wipe out any loss of revenue.

If the Government are serious about improving Northern Ireland's economic competitiveness, the single most significant step that they could take would be to lower corporation tax for Northern Ireland to below the prevailing rate in the Republic of Ireland. In doing so, let the Treasury set annual targets for business growth and new investment, to test my belief and that of the business community in Northern Ireland that, far from reducing tax revenues, such a step would, over time, significantly increase them. I repeat that call again today and ask the Minister to address the issue.

What I ask for could be done in a manner that directly altered the rate for companies already in operation in Northern Ireland, or new foreign investors in the UK. Such a move would prevent companies already in place in mainland Great Britain from upping sticks and setting up a shadow company in Northern Ireland solely to milk the benefits of the lower corporation tax. Perhaps the Minister could give a commitment to give the matter serious consideration. The simple, easily monitored alteration I have suggested would allay the Chancellor's fears that such a system could be massively abused, and would at a stroke ensure that Northern Ireland was able to compete with its neighbour, the Republic.

What objections could central Government, or for that matter the Treasury, have if the result were increased revenue from new, skilled jobs and reduced benefit claims? The only remaining objection would be the old chestnut that we cannot treat Northern Ireland differently for fear of having to do the same for other regions of the UK. The answer to that is simple—when during the past 30 years has Northern Ireland not been treated differently when it suited the Government?

Indeed, there have been examples of time-limited fiscal variations—for example, in relation to the climate change levy and its non-implementation, to assist the development of the natural gas industry. Corporation tax variation is a further measure that could have a dramatic influence for good in the Province, not just for one industry, but for all. Instead of casting around for reasons not to vary the tax, surely the Government should think of the contribution that they could make to the future of the most disadvantaged part of the UK.

As I have stated, corporation tax could be changed directly with very little trouble, and that is our goal. If the Government remain timid about such things, perhaps the Minister, whom I know is certainly not timid, could consult with the Chancellor about alternative ways of getting to the same place. For example, the Government are aware of the proposal that approved and allowable expenditure for research and development and for training and marketing included in the corporation tax computation could be multiplied by a factor of three and allowed as a deduction in arriving at the taxable profits for businesses based in Northern Ireland. Might the Minister and the Chancellor get together on that?

Corporation tax may be the most significant issue for economic competitiveness in Northern Ireland, but it is not the only one. A number of significant problems face various sectors of our economy and they must be addressed. I should like to move on to aggregates tax. The disparity between aggregates tax levels in Northern Ireland and those across the border is both a drain on the Northern Ireland economy and an incentive for illegal smuggling. Given the evasion and avoidance, special arrangements for Northern Ireland could increase the economic competitiveness of the Province without having a significant impact on the taxes raised. Can we have an assurance today that that issue will be taken up? Without that, business will continue to drain away across the border, and no benefit will accrue to the Treasury or to businesses in the Province.

Another matter that I would like to spend some time on is industrial derating. The decision to remove that has the potential to cause the most damage to the manufacturing industry in Northern Ireland in a generation. The decision has had a serious impact on manufacturing across the Province. It is clear that the measure will particularly affect the profitability and viability of a number of businesses, so it is vital that the phasing in of the policy is frozen and that a detailed analysis of its impact is carried out. Unless the proposals are halted, or other assistance is given, many crucial jobs will be lost to the economy. Surely that is not something that the Minister is prepared to contemplate. Perhaps we might hear the Government's view today.

The ending of industrial derating could devastate the economy of Northern Ireland. The competitive advantage in business has tilted dramatically in favour of the south. That decision has no saving graces: our economy will lose jobs, tax revenues and entrepreneurial talent. At a time when Invest Northern Ireland is working to promote the economy, industrial derating will completely undermine any modest advances. Any good work in other areas could be entirely wiped out by that measure, and economic progress could be set back years. I ask the Minister why the Government would act against their own jobs promotion agency.

All that comes when many traditional manufacturing jobs are being lost because of lower costs abroad. There is concern that industrial derating will be very damaging to existing businesses and those that may be considering coming to the Province. Industrial derating was once a selling point and advantage that Northern Ireland offered, but now even that has gone.

Large companies in Northern Ireland operate in extremely competitive international markets on extremely tight margins and cannot increase prices to absorb such cost increases. Industrial derating will hit hardest the bigger companies, particularly those with large premises. By implication, they employ the most people, or deal in commodities with tight margins. This state of affairs was brought about not by international competition or by internal terrorism in this instance, but by a stroke of a Government pen. Like Nicodemus of old, I ask, "How can these things be?"

I would like to take a few moments to consider the landfill tax. In the 2003 Budget, which I have raised with the Minister before, the Chancellor promised that any increase in landfill tax would be implemented in a revenue-neutral manner. He promised that additional revenue would be ploughed back by way of grants. However, I have had it confirmed by Stephen Peover of the Department of the Environment, in a letter dated 17 February, that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has used his ministerial discretion to ensure that the Chancellor's promise will not be honoured in Northern Ireland, thus placing Northern Ireland businesses at a direct and severe disadvantage compared with the rest of the UK. I ask the Minister to find out how the Secretary of State is using his discretion to ensure that the negative effect of his reneging on the Chancellor's promise will be offset.

There are several other issues that I would like briefly to highlight. Northern Ireland is already at a disadvantage because of higher electricity, insurance and transport costs and waste disposal charges. Even our education system, which traditionally has been one of our strongest selling points, is under threat because of the Government's dogmatic approach. All those disadvantages, which have been made far worse by the Government's policies, must be addressed properly—not to ensure the maintenance of political dogma, but for the good of the Province. What comfort can the Minister give us today?

Far too many of Northern Ireland's potential work force are not economically active. More than 530,000 people—41 per cent. of the working-age population—fall into that category, and there are worrying underlying trends. Since 1978, unemployment has fallen by 45 per cent. and employment has risen by 33 per cent., yet the number of incapacity benefit claimants has risen by 156 per cent. The rise in incapacity claimants is three times the total fall in unemployment. Northern Ireland has the highest long-term and youth unemployment among the 12 UK regions. It is obvious that it needs a vigorous programme to encourage people into the workplace. How does the Minister propose to address the problem? What action will she take? What targets will she set each year to reduce the number of people who are economically inactive?

I would like to mention public sector reform in Northern Ireland again briefly. It is undoubtedly needed. We need less government and better and faster planning procedures. There is no political, social or economic argument for the vast array of Departments and quangos that have been inflicted on Northern Ireland. They have had a stifling effect on the Province and would be neither missed nor mourned. Is the Minister prepared to be as brave as the problem requires, and can we have clear assurances to that effect today?

Northern Ireland does not have a good reputation for being able to deliver quick planning decisions. It is not my purpose to apportion blame for that, but it is important to get it right. No doubt it will take a combination of additional resources, more streamlined procedures and a willingness to take decisions rather than sit on them. Quick decisions are vital to attracting investment and securing jobs. Planning delay discourages private sector involvement and sends out a signal that Northern Ireland is not geared up to do business at the highest level. When opportunities arise, we must be in a position to take advantage of them. We cannot do anything about our geographical location at the edge of Europe, but there is no reason why we cannot have a planning process to rival any in Europe.

What commitments can the Minister give us on that matter? For example, having consulted on the investment strategy, is further time-consuming planning consultation necessary for each project or each part of its implementation? Perhaps the Minister might care to tackle that as well in her response.

In conclusion—I am sure that my colleagues and the Minister are glad to hear those words—we have focused thus far on what the Government can do, but it is important to put it on the record that, if the Government do what they should, it will be up to the people of Northern Ireland to respond and to take advantage of the opportunities. I believe that the whole of the UK will benefit in the long run by helping Northern Ireland now. Northern Ireland has the potential to transform its economy into one that is more balanced between the public and private sector, but that will not happen unless it has the opportunity to prosper. Simply wishing it to happen will not deliver it. The Government must put in place the proper environment.

Today, I have touched on just a few of the many areas that need to be addressed, and I am sure that my hon. Friends will pick up any slack that I have missed. Although many of these matters will ultimately fall to a devolved Administration, others will need the assistance of the Treasury. Either way, Northern Ireland cannot afford to wait for devolution before it makes the changes that are needed to equip our economy for the years and decades to come. The Government have the opportunity to make a difference and to create a Northern Ireland that has not only put violence behind it, but has a secure economic future. I call upon the Government to rise to those challenges.

11.30 am

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) on securing the debate. The competitiveness of the Northern Ireland economy has been well highlighted by recent pronouncements not only by the Secretary of State but by others in Northern Ireland who increasingly realise that we are dependent on the public sector. That is not what people in Northern Ireland want, and it is not sustainable in the long run [illegible]ow. However, when it comes to public [illegible]ncements, it is important that public representatives, including the Secretary of State, should talk up our economy rather than talk it down. We all want to work towards the goal of reducing the public sector, but we can only do that if we engender confidence in the private sector to attract outside investment.

I want to make a couple of general points and then move on to specific points relating to my constituency of East Antrim. My hon. Friend made many references to the tax regime in Northern Ireland, especially the differences between corporation tax in the Republic and in Northern Ireland, which create disadvantages when trying to attract outside investment. There is no doubt about that. The complaints from other European countries indicate that one of the Irish Republic's biggest advantages in attracting outside investment has been the low corporation tax it has imposed on manufacturing companies that export a large percentage of their output.

I know that there has been resistance but, in the long run, reducing corporation tax would not be a cost to the Exchequer. One has only to examine the figures in the Republic. Although its corporation tax is lower than corporation tax in the United Kingdom, it comprises a substantially higher percentage of total tax revenue than corporation tax in the UK. To use the economists' term, the elasticity of demand is such that the lower the tax rate, the higher the total revenue obtained.

If the Minister is concerned that that would lead to unequal treatment for Northern Ireland, it can be offset through the other support given to industry. We should examine the record of Invest Northern Ireland and the number of times that it has been brought before the Public Accounts Committee in this House, where it has been found wanting regarding how public money has been administered and, indeed, the amount of public money that has been spent on companies simply to bolster failure rather than reward success.

Attacking the problem by rewarding successful companies by taking less off them in tax is more sustainable than simply propping up companies through the various incentives and grants given by Invest Northern Ireland. Such a policy would also help to reduce some of the bureaucracy that exists in the grant regime. The approach should be given serious consideration. It does not have to have negative revenue consequences for the Exchequer. It needs more serious exploration. It has been dealt with in a dismissive way in the past. We do not have a unified grant regime, so why do we need a unified tax regime for the promotion of industry?

My hon. Friend pointed out that, if we are to have a competitive economy, we must reduce the high levels of low economic activity—if that is not a contradiction. In Northern Ireland, three times more people claim sickness and disability benefit than in the Irish Republic and twice as many claim as in the rest of the United Kingdom. I do not believe that that reflects the state of the working population. There are structural problems. I know that the Government intend to introduce proposals to deal with those on long-term benefits and it is important that that aspect is tackled.

At the moment, competitiveness in Northern Ireland is bolstered by the fact that large numbers of people have come from eastern Europe to provide labour for many industries. They have made a valuable contribution to the economy of Northern Ireland and it is sad that in recent times there have been attacks on some of those people in the areas where they live. There have been those who see them as outsiders and, for racist reasons or whatever, they have attacked them. In Galen, in my constituency of East Antrim, a large number of immigrants are employed and they make up a valuable part of the work force. That is true in many manufacturing plants and agricultural establishments in Northern Ireland.

I shall use a couple of examples from my constituency of East Antrim to show how public bodies could help to increase competitiveness. One of the issues has been raised in the past by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and mentioned by my colleague the Member for—[HON. MEMBERS: "Upper Bann."]—my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): So many colleagues.

Sammy Wilson: I have eight of them; I cannot remember where they all come from .

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): It's an age thing.

Sammy Wilson: We will never forget.

My hon. Friends raised the issue of the planning regime. Planning has had a detrimental impact on the development of the economy in Northern Ireland. I have mentioned the slowness of the planning regime to the Minister before. In my constituency, the quarry at Glenarm is looking for an extension. It provides not just stone for building roads, but limestone for many industrial products in Northern Ireland that are essential to local industry. However, the issue of whether there can be an extension has been going on for nearly two years. The product will still be needed and, ironically, if the planning permission is not given, limestone will have to be imported from areas of natural beauty and special scientific interest in other parts of the UK, adding to the costs, but not improving the environment in any way. The planning regime has gone tortuously through investigating whether there should be an extension, leaving uncertainty even though there has been huge public as well as private investment.

The port of Larne in East Antrim is now the major roll-on, roll-off port for the whole island of Ireland. It is a valuable gateway for exporting goods and importing raw materials to Northern Ireland. Its infrastructure has been improved recently, thanks to the efforts of my hon.

Friend the Member for Belfast, East when he was Regional Development Minister in the Northern Ireland Assembly. However, he fell short of improving the whole. We have a major port, and half the road to it either way is served by single rather than dual lanes. It is detrimental to the movement of goods in and out of the port. Larne will need expansion, and I trust that it will get the help that has been afforded to ports such as Dublin in the Irish Republic and Warrenpoint in Northern Ireland. The port is an important element in retaining competitiveness in Northern Ireland.

Furthermore, we must have an energy source that keeps us competitive. There is diversity, and East Antrim is one of the main suppliers of power. We use gas, oil and coal. B9 Energy, a firm based in East Antrim, is a leading provider of renewable energy through wave power and, more recently, through capturing the power of underwater currents. A test has been undertaken at Strangford to see how effective it will be.

It is important that we have not only a diversity of energy sources, but a competitive energy market. Despite what some environmentalists say, it is important that we do not put all our eggs in one basket and that Northern Ireland has a range of energy sources.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann on securing the debate. I look forward to the Minister's answers, and I hope that this debate will be the start of an exploration of how we can improve the competitiveness of the Northern Ireland economy.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I join my colleagues in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) on successfully securing the debate and ensuring that we discuss an issue that is important to all our constituents. Other of my colleagues want to participate, so I shall not go over a lot of the ground through which my two colleagues have already carefully taken us. Many of those issues will come up, because we must tackle them if we are to deal with the economic advancement of the Province.

I shall make my remarks short, because I want the Minister to have enough time to respond. Often in previous debates, she has been able to say, "I'm sorry, I haven't the time to deal with all your questions," and that was the last we heard of them. We did not get the answers that we needed. It is important that we give her the opportunity to deal with the issues that have been outlined—many of them carefully and in detail by my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) rightly mentioned those who are on incapacity benefit, the number of claimants and how the Minister and the Government are trying to tackle the issue across the United Kingdom. I ask the Government to ensure that in tackling a problem, they do not hurt those who are genuinely sick and in need. I make an earnest appeal to the Government: I agree with them that we need to tackle a problem where there is one, but in dealing with it we must be sensitive to those in the community who are weak, sick and unable to contribute. We must not hurt those in genuine need.

There are those on benefits such as incapacity benefit who might be enjoying the mobility benefits available to them while damaging and hurting those who are genuinely in need. For example, I know a gentleman in my locality who seems to run an important taxi service from his mobility vehicle. I make my solemn appeal, because with so many immigrant employees coming into the country and taking jobs in agriculture, engineering or the manufacturing plants left in the Province, one must ask who filled those jobs before that influx of people. We must remember that, especially in agriculture, many of those jobs had existed for a long time. In fact, in the past there were more jobs, because agricultural industry was healthier. One must ask why so many people from across the world are coming in to take those jobs when we have persons in the Province who should be economically active. It is important to find out.

Many of our constituencies have known the benefit of Northern Ireland's historic textile industry, but it has been decimated and crippled. It really is no more, or it is at least right down at the bottom, when it used to be right at the top. The firms moved to other parts of the world not because of corporation tax, but because people were paid buttons to do the work. Many of them were really slave labour. I shall not excuse that, and I make it abundantly clear that a labourer is worthy of their hire, and there ought to be proper and appropriate return for a person who goes out and works.

We have problems in industry. In the South Antrim constituency, why is there an industrial wasteland at Corr's Corner—Global Point in Newtownabbey—when Reg Empey, waxing eloquent as the Minister on one occasion, regarded it as what would be the jewel in the crown of practically the whole United Kingdom? I have asked that question on several occasions and have never received an answer. When I was speaking with Newtownabbey council staff at a function the other day, one lady said to me that people are anxious to go there, but it is still lying as waste.

When I mentioned the issue to Invest Northern Ireland, it said that there were some problems with the new metropolitan plan. Let us be quite honest: if the area has been designated for industrial use, instead of it remaining a wasteland, it is about time that we put it to good use. I ask the Minister to ensure that I have a meeting about that, because we must deal with it. I shall not allow the site to remain a wasteland. It is a disgrace that that is so. If industrialists want to go there, why are they not being permitted to do so? Is it because of planning? My two colleagues mentioned planning problems. I shall not go into that issue, which is a hardy annual for some of us, but hon. Members are angry and frustrated at the slowness of planning decisions and what that means.

We face problems with energy costs and overheads. Electricity costs in Northern Ireland are ridiculous, and we must tackle that. The Government must help to deal with those problems because they create disincentives for people to come to Northern Ireland. We want people to have incentives to come to Northern Ireland. One great incentive is that the vast majority of our population are willing to work, and they are workers second to none. We should harness their energy and channel it into economic development.

I said that I would be brief, and I have only one more point for the Minister. The Government are not harnessing all the virtues of the international airport at Antrim. The airport is second to none, but its value is not being used. One problem that has been mentioned to me is that there is no train connection between the airport and the city. If that is a problem, we must deal with it. We cannot allow the international airport not to have the proper connections or the proper infrastructure to enable it to be utilised in full. The work force within the airport and within Antrim are energetic. In many ways, they are inspired and they are doing everything within their power to ensure that they attract business, but I want the Government to consider what can be done to assist them and to advance things further.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I shall take only a quick canter around the course. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) was getting at me because in a previous long debate I left the Minister with a very short period in which to respond. I am delighted that she is in her place. I recognise that she came here at some cost, because another engagement had been in her diary for a long time. She recognised, however, that her first duty is to the House, and rightly so. We are glad she is with us.

I join colleagues in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) on securing this very important debate and on his contribution. The fact that short speeches followed has much to do with the comprehensive way in which he dealt with the subject. Such slack as remains relates to the most important area of Northern Ireland—Belfast. Not least because he represents Upper Bann, he neglected to deal with that area in any detail, but as a Belfast MP, I will touch on the issues relevant to Belfast.

First, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson)—just to prove that I can remember the name of his constituency—on the importance of the ministerial team for Northern Ireland talking up our economy. The Secretary of State ill served Northern Ireland when he indicated in the United States that the economy is not viable. Such comments will not encourage outside investors to bring their investment to Northern Ireland and provide much-needed jobs.

I also agree with my hon. Friend's remarks on the Planning Service. We have touched on that subject many times in Westminster Hall and on the Floor of the House. The Planning Service in Northern Ireland is a nightmare. It has lost Northern Ireland more jobs than any other factor, including the troubles, and is slow to respond to important applications. It has in place new procedures to fast-track applications if there is a major implication for jobs in the Province. I think that those procedures dealt with the recent application by Coca-Cola and that they are being applied to the IKEA application. I hope that the procedures work and that they improve the situation.

I shall touch on some "up" factors for the Belfast economy before dealing with some negatives. Unemployment in the Belfast area is the lowest ever on record at 4.9 per cent. Sceptics, if there were any here, might say that that is because the figures have again been doctored. The Government have changed the basis of calculation so often, but I suppose that there is an upside even to that, because if they are employing people to do that it helps the employment statistics. Fifty per cent. of the foreign direct investment companies are based in the Belfast area, and there are two airports and a seaport, all in close proximity to the city. There are 6,135 VAT-registered businesses, and 183,000 people are employed in the city. There are two world-class universities, a well developed knowledge base, and a good and skilled work force.

I have rattled those figures off not simply to prove that my researcher is earning his money, but to avoid the accusation, when I give the next series of statistics, that I am considering only the negative issues. One reason for unemployment perhaps being the lowest ever on record is the fact that the population has declined by 30 per cent. in the Belfast area over the past three decades. In many cases, that has been due to the violence and conflict in the Province, which have been concentrated to a large extent in the city area.

There has also been a decline in traditional industries. The public sector dominance of the employment statistics in Northern Ireland is uncomfortably great, and 72 per cent. of all civil service jobs are in the Belfast area. There is a mismatch between land supply and demand. The city centre is very poorly developed, and there is a fracturing of neighbourhoods. There are high levels of long-term unemployment. There is confusion in governance, duplication of effort and dilution of resources. There is competition from low-cost economies. The cost of doing business in the Belfast area and in Northern Ireland generally is very high. The dichotomy of standards in the education system contributes to our employment difficulties and there has been a very low business birth rate.

The result of all that is that we have an imbalanced economy. It is vulnerable to external market forces. There is a lack of export potential. There is an inability to attract skilled workers to the city. Everything that is generally the case in Belfast applies to my Belfast, East constituency. Several wards there have the highest long-term unemployment and the lowest educational attainment. Therefore, in seeking to underpin what we hope will eventually become a sustainable peace in Northern Ireland, we cannot overemphasise the importance of a strong, prosperous economy.

Our long-established dependence on the public sector is not helping to achieve the increased innovation and entrepreneurship and the competitive advantage required to survive in the global economy. We need to develop a robust and more buoyant private sector, particularly as regards the manufacturing base. We need to attract increased inward investment.

To do all that, we need, as my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann said, a fairer rate of corporation tax. I suspect that the Minister will say that there are difficulties, even from a European point of view, in having differential rates in the region. However, there was a legal case in Europe in which it was indicated that that is possible, although it might have implications for the subventions that are given to that region. I certainly would not want business to receive money that would otherwise go to those in need within the economy, but there are other ways to cook the same goose.

The Minister should consider designating Northern Ireland an enterprise zone, with special rates and other factors that would attract investment allowed, even if only for a limited period, until Northern Ireland builds itself up and comes out of conflict, as I hope it will. That extra incentive must be given, particularly as a lot of the competition is competition on the same island. The Irish Republic has the clear advantage in that it not only takes money from UK taxpayers via Europe to build its infrastructure, but provides more attractive corporation tax levels.

Another factor that can help to turn the situation around is more effective research and development support. There needs to be better targeting of funding in the commercial and education sectors and closer co-operation between educationists and entrepreneurs. Research and development uptake is poor, although the available R and D assistance for firms could be better employed.

The creation of a business culture infused by a spirit of innovation would also be achieved with the reduction in the corporation tax rate—in my view, to 10 per cent. I do not believe in harmony with the Irish Republic: if it would give us the edge, we should take that edge by setting the rate at 10 rather than 12.5 per cent. That factor alone could achieve a great deal in economic growth and make Northern Ireland less dependent on subventions from the Treasury and the UK economy.

The news is not all bad, however. IKEA's recent decision to come to the east Belfast area is very much welcome and a tremendous boost, although we must ensure that the local people are skilled up to take whatever employment comes as a result of that, whether directly in IKEA or in kitchen fitting or any other jobs that flow from such retailers coming to an area. Skills training is necessary now, and I hope that the Department for Employment and Learning provides the company with the skills base that it will need.

Forthcoming measures to address the lack of investment and poor social and education infrastructure throughout working-class Unionist areas of Belfast will be important, and I look forward to the ministerial statement on those, which I believe will be made towards the end of this month. I think that the announcement will indicate that one section of the community in Northern Ireland has been bypassed by a statistical sleight of hand. The statistics have been compiled by ward, but much of the Unionist deprivation has existed among areas of plenty.

I could take hon. Members to almost every deprived area in my constituency and show them that those areas are surrounded by detached houses and luxury dwellings. The overall ward statistics hide the deprivation, but I believe that the Government now have a much more compelling case available, indicating that there is significant need in that Unionist community. With that need identified, I hope that the response will be not a search for some quick fix, but a co-ordinated strategy.

Finally, there is much more successful development to be had through call centres, which Northern Ireland has traditionally been capable of attracting. The Northern Ireland accent is so calm, relaxing and therefore easy to understand that call centres go there automatically. The future for Northern Ireland will be in such IT-related activities. In east Belfast, a future for IT must be encouraged in Titanic Quarter—a massive area within minutes of Belfast city centre that is available for employment-led uses.

We must not see only leisure facilities, apartments and other attractive elements for a developer. We must ensure that the key elements of the area's development plan, whatever it is, encourage more jobs there, so that the yard, which at its height had 25,000 people working in it, can, through new industries, including IT in particular, bring back the industrial life that we once saw in east Belfast.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I should also like to thank the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) for introducing this debate, which is the first opportunity that we have had to discuss Northern Ireland's economy since the Secretary of State's speech at the Fabian Society in January.

The Secretary of State was right to highlight Northern Ireland's reliance on the public sector, although the manner in which he commented on Northern Ireland's sustainability was—to be euphemistic—suboptimal, as has rightly been mentioned. It was not a great advert for getting money into the Province. None the less, although progress has been made in recent years in encouraging private business enterprises, the public sector still provides about one third of all jobs in Northern Ireland, as compared with one fifth of jobs in the rest of the UK. It is abundantly clear that, ideally, we would shift that balance.

The hon. Gentleman and others were right to discuss enhanced co-operation between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland and, more specifically, to compare the levels of corporation tax, which causes a serious problem for Northern Ireland. I need not repeat that. We have heard what the issues are. Although I can understand why the Treasury might be reluctant to make a special case for Northern Ireland, it seems appropriate to consider a change, perhaps for a fixed period—10 years, for example—to give the private sector a kick-start, for all the reasons that we have heard.

I shall be interested to hear what the Minister thinks or, I fear, what she has been told to say by the Treasury on that point. She is a free-thinking spirit and a shining light of independent thought, but we shall see whether she is given latitude to do the right thing and to agree with Opposition Members.

I was disappointed that the Secretary of State did not take the opportunity to discuss paramilitary crime and extortion in Northern Ireland when he discussed the state of the economy as a whole. When the Federation of Small Businesses gave evidence to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee at the beginning of February, it reported that 6 per cent. of businesses in Northern Ireland are affected by perceived illegal donations, which equates to some 4,000 businesses. Further, the Organised Crime Task Force has reported that extortion rackets earn millions of pounds for paramilitary groups every year, particularly, it must be said, for loyalist groups.

However, the Government do not seem to be making a serious attempt to solve the problem or even begin to understand the extent of it. Although the OCTF has done a lot of excellent work, the Government must take action to tackle extortion, because we do not feel that they have done enough. Indeed, the FSB has called for the commissioning of research on the cost and impact of racketeering and extortion on small businesses and the wider economy. In fact, the OCTF feels strongly that there should be an independent free phone line to encourage victims of extortion to seek help and advice. Will the Minister give a commitment to do those three things?

I was also disappointed that the Government were not willing to discuss the cost to Northern Ireland's economy of sectarianism. I have made the point before, but I shall say it again: a huge amount of money is wasted every year in Northern Ireland by the duplication that has resulted from the difficulties that we had before. For example, there are three leisure centres where there should be one, nine health centres where there should be two, and money is spent on school buildings instead of on schoolchildren. Last year, the Secretary of State said that in the education sector there is "an urgent need for action to address the problems of overcapacity and duplication that exist across the system."

All that costs money, and that has an indirect effect on the amount that is available to be spent in the economy. A simple solution has been presented to the Government many times. That is integrated education. I will not dwell on it because that is not what we are here to discuss, but I rhetorically ask the Minister again to consider the benefits of integrated education to resolve that problem and, thereby, to release more money that can be invested in the economy of the Province.

While it is useful for us to have a debate such as this on the economy, it is the political parties in Northern Ireland that are discussing the issue and taking responsibility for driving forward Northern Ireland's economy. When the Assembly was functioning, a lot of good work was done by the then Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, Sir Reg Empey, to encourage inward investment in Northern Ireland. We should add to the Assembly's ability to act in the field of economics by devolving tax-varying powers to it. I am sure that, when the Assembly is restarted, there will be an interesting debate on whether that power can be devolved.

Finally, even though there is no Assembly at present, we should still be encouraging Northern Ireland politicians to come together to think and to talk about economic regeneration. Members have displayed a depth of wisdom and almost infinite knowledge today—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]. Unsurprisingly, they agree with me, and I thank them for praising my perceptiveness. Unfortunately, we do not benefit fully from that wisdom, because the Assembly has not been reconstituted. When it is, as suggested by the Alliance party, we should have an economic forum to work alongside the talks process—in fact, some such a forum should operate even now.

There is discussion now about Northern Ireland's political future, but discussions on its economic future are long overdue—as an addition to the political process, not a substitution for it. What is needed is a clear economic package to encourage business and investment alongside a functioning legislative Assembly, with local Ministers who can be held responsible for implementing it.

Hon. Members have made some interesting points, not least about the under-utilised international airport, which should mean speedier, and perhaps more environmentally friendly, links with Belfast. We have the opportunity for high-value investments. Bombardier has proved that, if jobs are given to Northern Ireland, staff will live up to expectations and provide a high-quality service.

I look forward, after the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) has spoken, to hearing the Minister's dutiful consideration of the points that have been made. If she feels that she has insufficient time, all that she has to say is, "I agree with all the points that hon. Members have made, and I give a commitment to implementing their suggestions sooner rather than later."

12.13 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson), whose constituency I have written down so that I do not get it wrong, on having introduced this important debate. I agree with what has been said by him and by the hon. Members for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson), for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and, indeed, for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik).

The Minister has gone to a great deal of trouble to get back for this debate. The hon. Member for Upper Bann did not come to hear what I have to say, so I hope that he will not consider it a discourtesy if I do not speak for more than one minute. I want the Minister to respond to all the good points that have been made. I shall have to apologise to my researcher, who has dug out a lot of information for me. As is typical in this place, it will not, unfortunately, be read out.

I shall make just one point. I have been going to Northern Ireland for many years, since long before I got this job. People who have never been there ask, "Why do you go? Is it not awful, full of trouble and dangerous?" That is the perception. My one point is that that is what we have to change. Business can be attracted to Northern Ireland in many of the ways that have been described, but if I could change one aspect of the situation it would be that perception, which is wrong. There are problems, of course—there always have been—but it is a wonderful place. The people are very accommodating and that is the message that we need to get out to the world—that is what we should be about. My remarks have been brief. I want the Minister to respond to the sensible remarks that have been made, so I shall not take up any more time.

12.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): I add my congratulations to those of other hon. Members to the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) on having secured the debate. A lot has been said recently about the sustainability of the economy in Northern Ireland, so I welcome this timely opportunity to discuss the issues with him. As the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) said, my first duty is always to the House, and I am pleased to be here today.

The engagement that I am missing is a meeting of the Economic Development Forum of Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said that there should be a forum. There is one, and it is meeting at this moment. Some of the issues that we have touched on today are under consideration there. I give an assurance to hon. Members—I think that it will be accepted in the spirit in which it is given—that, for the Government, the economy is the top issue in Northern Ireland. We need economic prosperity because it provides the basis for living standards and improves public services, but it also aids political and social stability. Those of us who have seen the impact of unemployment in communities across the United Kingdom recognise the damage that it does socially and politically in Northern Ireland, so we are committed to ensuring that the economy is bolstered and improved.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) might have been rather brief in his comments because, the last time that he spoke on the economy, I chastised him afterwards, and we had a discussion on the matter. Let us consider the economic issues in Northern Ireland. There has been sustained economic growth for the past 15 years. Its economy is now growing faster than those of many regions of the UK and unemployment has dropped to the lowest that it has been. For the cynics among us, let me add that employment has increased to the highest level ever. Those facts together represent a significant change in employment and unemployment issues. In addition, if we consider productivity, the manufacturing industry is performing well, although there have been some job losses in that sector, which I deeply regret. There is tremendous improvement in many areas, and we need to build on that.

In one sense, we can say that Northern Ireland's manufacturing output is holding its own across the board. However, we recognise that this is a period of uncertainty and distress for individuals who have lost their jobs. We predict that employment will grow, particularly in the tradeable services sector, which is forecast to produce some 54,000 jobs over the next decade. The hon. Member for Upper Bann mentioned comments made by the Secretary of State about unsustainability in Northern Ireland's economy. The Secretary of State was referring to the unsustainability of a public sector that has grown to an extent that has been detrimental to the private sector. He made it clear that he is committed to expanding the private sector in Northern Ireland for the long-term prosperity of Northern Ireland. That is what he said, and he has made such comments on many occasions since. Far from talking the economy down, he was talking it up; he was talking about expanding the private sector and encouraging investment.

The Secretary of State is shortly to lead a delegation to India, and I have led an Invest Northern Ireland trade delegation to China. The efforts that the Government are making to bring inward investment to Northern Ireland should not be underestimated. The comments of the Secretary of State should be considered in the context in which they were made, and in light of the action that he and his ministerial team have taken to improve the economy. The hon. Member for Upper Bann rightly said that public spending in Northern Ireland is at 60 per cent. of gross domestic product, nearly a third higher than the UK average. Despite more jobs and low registered unemployment, the level of economic inactivity is higher than the UK average.

A comment was made about the number of public bodies, and the extent of their work in Northern Ireland. The review of public administration that was undertaken in November showed that the number of public sector bodies has been reduced from 67 to 20, and there will shortly be an announcement about the responsibilities that will be transferred from central Government to local government.

On the economic side, GDP for Northern Ireland is 19 per cent. below the UK average. If we are to have the prosperous economy that we want and to attract inward investment and additional jobs, there needs to be increased focus on the development of the private sector. One third of all employment is in the public sector. We want the balance to change and increased employment in the private sector.

We must look increasingly at the global economy. We have talked about the Republic of Ireland today, but we will increasingly face challenges not only from there, but from across the world. As the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) said, we will combat that by competing not on low wages, but on skills and high value. That is our approach. The amazing economic growth in countries such as China and India can be seen as a threat, or as an opportunity for trade, investment and partnership. Invest Northern Ireland recently opened an office in Shanghai—indeed, I opened it—and, as I mentioned, the Secretary of State is going to India. Those things will assist us with inward investment.

It is worth repeating the comment of the hon. Member for Upper Bann that the Government cannot do the work of business, but can create conditions for a managed approach. He said that they are an enabler and supporter of business. Now we are seeing a role for political parties with real engagement on economic issues. As I am not at the meeting that I mentioned and we were unable to have that debate today, I have offered all political parties the opportunity to meet me to discuss economic issues.

With the publication of the economic vision last year, the importance of the debate was never more evident. The Economic Development Forum and economic spokespersons from the five main parties have considered the regional economic strategy, which will help us to deliver the vision. That can start to make a difference. If we do not address the challenges that we face now and ensure that we get investment into the private sector and infrastructure—issues that have been raised this morning—we will not be able to compete. That means ensuring that we have a highly skilled work force, addressing research and development for business and promoting innovation, so that Northern Ireland can compete.

I shall address some specific issues that were raised. Several hon. Gentlemen talked about planning delays. The devolved Assembly took an active role on that matter. It brought in strict planning regulations and rules in the interests of the environment and for other reasons. One problem has been that the rules and regulations are quite strict and build in some delay because of consultation. There has been a vast increase in the number of planning applications, but the modernising planning processes plan that I launched as Minister and the actions taken by my noble Friend Lord Rooker to speed up the planning process were important changes. The Assembly made it clear that we need to maintain the integrity of the planning system, but we also need to ensure that economic issues are not hampered by delays in the Planning Service.

The phasing out of industrial derating was brought up. Unlike the position with domestic rating, businesses in Northern Ireland pay similar rates to those in the rest of the UK. Manufacturing firms have been informed of the decision to phase out industrial derating. They will have had over eight years to adjust and to plan for paying full rates. In the UK, that cost had to be included in budgets for several years. It is estimated, based on just 15 per cent. of the rates liability, that in the first year, 2005–06, around £10 million will be collected. That is the other side of the coin. Money that is collected from industrial derating can be invested in infrastructure, the development of skills, and the public sector work that is needed for businesses to grow. It is important to recognise that there are two sides to this coin, and that the money can be used to benefit Northern Ireland—it stays in Northern Ireland.

The economic vision and economic strategy focus mainly on the key drivers of economic change, bringing economic prosperity and investment to Northern Ireland, and what will provide jobs. They are innovation, enterprise, skills and infrastructure. The key target—the hon. Member for Upper Bann asked for targets on a number of issues—is to reduce the imbalance between the rest of the UK and Northern Ireland through productivity and investment. The way to do that is to expand the private sector.

Several comments have been made about corporation tax, on which there has been a lot of debate. It is one of the matters being dealt with today at the Economic Development Forum in my absence. That issue was raised by the hon. Members for Upper Bann, for Belfast, East and for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson). I recognise that there have been calls, in relation to a wide range of interests, for a reduction in the rate of corporation tax. We are competing for inward investment with the Republic of Ireland, which has a corporation tax rate of 12.5 per cent. In this country, the rate is 30 per cent.

However, we need to take account of a number of arguments. Simply comparing headline rates does not give a complete picture. If we take into account other variables, such as the costs of labour, premises and business in Northern Ireland, we are talking about a comparison of about 22 per cent. with 14 per cent., rather than of 30 per cent. with 12.5 per cent.

When businesses are asked about the drivers to investing in Northern Ireland, they tell me that one of them is costs, but that the quality of the work force and support from Invest Northern Ireland also make a difference. To me, the key is investment in skills. We need further debate on these issues. We will welcome suggestions in the debate that I will have with other political parties, which would have happened today, as to how the overall fiscal system might be developed to benefit the Northern Ireland economy and how we can make more of the fiscal measures already at our disposal. We are not attracting the interest in research and development tax credits that I would like. There could be an increase that would directly benefit firms in Northern Ireland. I will be happy to give any support that I can on that.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann said that we should look at alternative ways of getting to the same place. I agree. We need to consider ways of giving additional support to businesses to encourage them to grow, invest and develop in Northern Ireland. I will say one thing that he said: companies could uproot from elsewhere to relocate to Northern Ireland, which would not help the UK economy as a whole. That needs to be considered, and there are related European Union issues. There is a case before the Commission concerning Portugal and the Azores. There are European issues as well as local and national issues, but let us look at ways in which we can expand and support businesses investing in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for South Antrim spoke about sustainability and incapacity benefit. I visited the jobs and benefits office in Antrim and spoke to the staff there. They are conscious of not trying to force people into work who are incapable of work, but recognise that it is crucial that people who can work and want to do so are given the necessary support, so they target support at individuals. On that ground, the hon. Gentleman should be reassured regarding economic inactivity.

The hon. Member for East Antrim spoke of concern about Invest Northern Ireland and where it is investing. I am sure that he would not have wanted Invest Northern Ireland not to invest £9.8 million in a project in Canyon Europe in his constituency. That investment is crucial. We can talk about propping up companies, but recently all four political parties approached the Government about support for Trivirix in Belfast to prop up that company for another month while a buyer was sought in order to maintain jobs in that area.

The issue of energy was also raised. Bringing new competition to the energy market—I recently made an announcement on that—makes a difference. We are mindful of the costs, but the introduction of privatisation to Northern Ireland brought us a very bad deal, which led to increased energy costs. The Secretary of State's environment and renewable energy fund will assist sustainability of supply.

The real issue with economic activity is to do with skills. I will send hon. Members more information on that. If we can be sure that we have the right skills for our work force so that the jobs of the future can be filled by people in Northern Ireland, we can start to address the bigger and wider issues. Despite our best efforts, there was not enough time for me to address all the issues raised by hon. Members, but I will write to them with my responses.

Endowment Mis-selling (Scotland)

12.29 pm

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise a subject that is of concern not only to many of my constituents, but to thousands of people throughout the length and breadth of Scotland. I draw the attention of the Chamber to early-day motion 1105, which has attracted the support of 51 hon. Members across the parties. That is a good response on a subject that effectively affects only Scotland. I am pleased with that response and the support that the motion attracted.

Mortgages have made front page news, although not necessarily for the best of reasons. It is with some trepidation that I discuss the subject. However, it is much harder to get recognition for the plight of many of our constituents who, through no fault of their own, have found themselves with a substantial shortfall in their endowment policies and no prospect of proper compensation, in spite of the fact that they prudently planned for the long term and had every reason to believe that the advice they received was sound, coming as it did from reputable professionals such as solicitors, major building societies and banks. Solicitors were regarded in such high professional esteem, in fact, that it was deemed unnecessary for them to be regulated by the Financial Services Authority and they were regulated by their own professional body.

Having referred to the publicity in the media, I must give credit where it is due. The BBC Radio Scotland programme "The Investigation" and The Herald newspaper have highlighted the injustice of mis-selling and have supported calls for action to resolve the problem. I welcome that, and those people who are affected are gratified by that support.

The crux of my argument is that a grossly unfair anomaly exists where people living side by side as neighbours have access to widely different compensation arrangements when they have been mis-sold endowment mortgages. Those who purchased their mortgage through banks and building societies can potentially be compensated in full. Those who used solicitors in Scotland will receive, if they are extremely lucky, a token gesture.

As with most financial issues, the scenario is quite complicated. I hope that the Chamber will bear with me if I go into detail about how the situation came about. Mortgage endowment policies were very popular in the '80s and '90s. For a low monthly payment, they were designed to build up a healthy lump sum in 25 years, which would pay off the mortgage with cash to spare. They were linked to stocks and shares and were sold by banks, building societies and, uniquely in Scotland, by solicitors who acted also as estate agents.

In their eagerness to sell the products and to gain commission from the financial companies that promoted them, some banks, building societies and law firms did not inform house buyers of the risks involved. Consumers should have been told that poor performance of the stock market could result in an endowment lump sum not growing enough to repay the mortgage. In many cases, that was not made clear and the policy was mis-sold.

For the avoidance of doubt, I want to emphasise that not everyone who has had to make up a shortfall was mis-sold their policy. In common with many other people, I am in that position. I was aware that the performance of the stock market could affect the return on the policy and although I am not particularly happy about it, I accept it was a risk that I took in the full knowledge of what could happen. For many people, that was not the case. It came as a shock to them to receive the red traffic light letters warning of endowment policy shortfalls. Far from being eventually mortgage free with an additional lump sum, in many cases they have to make up a substantial shortfall, often when they can ill afford to do so. People feel that they have been conned by those who sold them the policies, and they are rightly seeking compensation.

I was a member of the Standing Committee that scrutinised the Financial Services and Markets Bill more than five years ago. It brought in one unified body to replace the previous system of multiple regulators, complaints adjudicators and compensation schemes. It was seen as a huge step forward in resolving disputes quickly and with minimum formality by an independent person. The Bill also introduced tough new rules governing the sale of mortgage endowment policies by banks and building societies. The consequences for endowment policies purchased through a solicitor in Scotland prior to 1 December 2001, when the new legislation came into effect, were not anticipated.

The Bill was subject to substantial consultation, including pre-legislative scrutiny, and had cross-party support. Endowment mis-selling had at that time yet to surface as a major issue and the policies were still regarded as a good thing, in general. Solicitors were not as a profession subject to FSA regulation, as prior to the passage of the Bill FSA regulation was applied where it was deemed proportionate to do so. Some activities were exempted from FSA regulation on the grounds that those engaging in them were overseen by designated professional bodies. Solicitors came under that category, although that has a hollow ring to those who have been mis-sold policies by solicitors in Scotland and have little chance of redress.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise because I shall have to leave before the end of the debate; I have another engagement.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne) on raising the debate. She approached me on the subject in my capacity as Chairman of the Treasury Committee, as it has considered endowment mis-selling. As a result, I have written to the FSA, the Financial Ombudsman Service and to the Minister at the Treasury. I know that he will be as helpful as possible. However, the anomaly that makes Scotland stand out must be addressed. I will pursue those official lines, but in the event that we draw a blank there has to be a voluntary agreement so that people who have been mis-sold policies do not end up getting just £1,000.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman is making a speech, not an intervention.

Mr. McFall: I had just finished, Mr. Hood.

Sandra Osborne: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention. It is gratifying to have the support of the

[Sandra Osborne]

Chairman of the Treasury Committee, that august and powerful body, and for him to be behind the campaign. I thank him for his efforts to date and look forward to working with him on the issue in future if necessary.

The bottom line is that if the policy was sold by a bank or a building society, the complaint should first be made to them. If that is not satisfactory, the matter can be taken to the financial services ombudsman. If the ombudsman upholds a complaint of mis-selling, he has a legal power to order a bank or building society to pay compensation for a shortfall. As I understand it, about 60 per cent. of cases heard by the FSA are upheld and full compensation is awarded.

If an endowment policy was mis-sold by an adviser regulated by the FSA, compensation is based on comparing the current financial position, taking the endowment policy into account, with what the position would be now if the client had taken out a repayment mortgage at the outset. Many people have told me that if the risk had been made clear to them they would have opted for a repayment mortgage. That is a clear and fair criterion for awarding compensation.

On the other hand, if the endowment mortgage was bought from a solicitor in Scotland before 2001, a complaint cannot be made to the financial services ombudsman. Mortgage policies sold by Scottish solicitors in the 1990s are regulated by the Law Society of Scotland, which has no legal powers to order compensation for a shortfall in a mis-sold policy. It can only deal with a complaint that claims inadequate professional services, and latterly for stress and inconvenience, with a maximum award of £1,000 in cases dating from 1991 until April 2005. On that date, the compensation threshold was increased to £5,000 for new business. In cases where policies were purchased before 1991, the Law Society will not even hear the complaint. Obviously, where cases are upheld, the £1,000 limit is significantly less than the shortfalls of thousands of pounds that people face.

The chances of a case being upheld are slim. The Law Society received 113 complaints about alleged endowment mis-selling in the first nine months of 2004. Just one case was upheld, triggering a compensation payout of £240, and 46 cases were abandoned because of the strenuous legal process that complainants must follow. In contrast to the FSA system, people are subjected to the rigorous legal process that is applied by the Law Society, in which the burden is on the complainant to prove that they were mis-sold a policy.

I am aware of only two cases that were upheld by the Law Society in 2005, one of which was that of Gail McEwan. She received a payment of £500. I should like to pay tribute to her; she has been instrumental in setting up a group in Scotland to campaign for justice for those who were mis-sold endowments. I and other hon. Members with similarly affected constituents fully support that.

Many people have taken their case to the Scottish legal services ombudsman, but her role is limited to investigating how the Law Society has handled complaints made by legal services consumers about solicitors. In the case of Gail McEwan, the ombudsman published a 30-page report upholding her complaint about the way in which the Law Society managed her original complaint. I believe that the office is now inundated with similar complaints.

I thank the Minister for his response to me in a letter of 7 November 2005. He stated that consumers who purchased through a solicitor in Scotland prior to the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 retain their legal right to pursue misrepresentation through the courts. That is indeed so, but only cases up to the value of £1,500 can be heard in the small claims court without the services of a solicitor.

Gail McEwan and her group have looked at the possibility of bringing a test case, but the pursuers panel, which is, of course, made up of solicitors, has advised that the costs of doing that could potentially be up to £50,000—an unrealistic sum for people already caught in the endowment trap. In any case, why should one set of consumers be left out on a limb because they made their purchase from one vendor rather than another? That cannot be fair.

This state of affairs is a good example of why the law on financial regulation was changed. The old arrangements left many gaps that meant that consumers did not have the level of protection that they have now, but there are still thousands of people in Scotland who face financial ruin as a result of the current legislation.

People were encouraged, in the 1980s and 1990s, to take out endowment mortgages as a method of paying for their homes. Those who sold the policies received generous commission at that time. Some people have as many as five endowment policies, as they were encouraged to top up existing policies if they moved house. As a result of that anomaly, people are having to sell their properties because they cannot afford to convert to a repayment method so late in their mortgage arrangements. Others must extend their retirement plans. For many it is now an uphill struggle to find additional money every month to meet their mortgage payments.

I have examples of the situation that people are in as a result of the anomaly. The first account states:

"I am a single working woman of a certain age who is now stuck with a sizeable repayment mortgage—the endowment has cost me thousands of pounds and it seems most unjust that because I was offered (I did not seek it) advice at the time of concluding missives on a house purchase I now find I have no right to redress or consumer protection."

Here is another case:

"I am told that there will be a shortfall of as much as £6000. It would appear that my wife would be better off financially if I were to die before the termination of the policy."

A third explains:

"We took this endowment on in completely good faith according to the advice of our lawyer. If he would have given any indication of the slightest risk of shortfall we would have taken a different style of mortgage. These policies were strongly recommended then".

A further example reads:

"It took me a year to realise the situation vis à vis mortgage selling via a solicitor and why we did not qualify for compensation. During this time I now feel that to add insult to injury rather than helping me understand the legal position the Law Society was playing silly games."

The final example comes from someone who says:

"As a naive 20 year old in a new city buying his flat I was sold an endowment by my then solicitor. This I was informed was the only option for a skint first time buyer."

The Law Society of Scotland says that it has the greatest sympathy with people who are suffering a shortfall in relation to endowments they have bought. It has taken extensive advice on what it can do to help and says that it is legally unable to order more compensation. However, as I understand it the Law Society of England and Wales already advises its member firms to adopt exactly the same approach to its members as the Financial Services Authority does to its members: it should establish the background nature of the complaint and, if that is upheld, the client should be awarded compensation to address the mortgage shortfall in full. Compensation payments should be obtained via the relevant firm's professional indemnity insurer.

That seems to have happened in certain cases in Scotland, but the Law Society does not have precise figures on how often it happens. I am not aware of any such instance, and given the number of complaints that are being made it has certainly not been the standard response. That places the Law Society of Scotland in a unique position within the UK marketplace as the only regulatory body not able, or perhaps not willing, to require enforcement so that its members make good in full any financial loss sustained by their clients as a result of inappropriate advice.

There is a school of thought that argues that the reason so few cases have been upheld is that Scottish lawyers are so good and do not make many mistakes. The evidence of a fourfold increase in complaints since 2001 would suggest the contrary. I do not accept that argument.

I note the announcement made in the past few days of Scottish Executive plans to introduce the Legal Profession and Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill. Scots who receive poor service from their lawyers will soon be able to claim up to £20,000 in compensation. The current system of self-regulation will be abolished and regulation will be passed to a new commission—an independent body with an inbuilt majority of lay members. That will be funded by a levy on lawyers and an additional charge on the firms that attract the most complaints. I am not sure how, if at all, that will affect people who have been mis-sold endowment mortgages. However, it will be interesting to pursue that aspect of the matter, and I should be grateful if the Minister could give me some information about it.

The Minister said in his letter that consumers who have taken financial advice in Scotland subsequent to 1 December 2005 will all benefit from the framework of protection set out in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Presumably the new Scottish legislation will not be relevant to them, as financial services are reserved to Westminster and consumers throughout the UK have enjoyed the same rights since 2005. Clearly, that is how it should have been all along and it was a mistake to exclude solicitors from regulation by the FSA when the legislation was introduced. In any case, many Scottish solicitors were registered with the FSA in the 1990s prior to December 2001 when the Act came into effect.

I have been asked to explain why in those circumstances people cannot have access to the FSA complaints system, including the ability to apply to the Financial Ombudsman Service for an adjudication on an endowment mis-selling case. Also, many solicitors acted as agents for bodies, such as building societies, that come under FSA regulation. What are the implications of that? Has the Minister looked into whether there is any scope for the financial services ombudsman to consider those cases as appropriate?

That brings me to the thorny subject of retrospection. I am aware that the Government regard it as a problem, but in the light of what I have explained it is essential to consider what could be done to help the group in question, by any means available. I know that discussions have taken place between the Treasury and the Scottish Executive, and I hope that my hon. Friend can shed some light on a possible way forward.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne) on securing an Adjournment debate on this important issue, which has significantly affected a great number of people. Although I shall in no way downplay the importance of the points she has raised, it would be difficult to establish a solution that was acceptable to her. However, I am willing to meet her once the debate is over to discuss matters further and to have a close look at the situation. I do not want to offer false hope, but we do need to look further at the issue.

Let me also say that it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. I write to you weekly on European affairs, but I have never served on a Committee that you chaired, so it is good to have this opportunity.

Clearly, the debate has specific relevance in Scotland, but my hon. Friend will agree that it also touches on wider issues such as the quality of financial services regulation. There is a recognition that the Government have taken positive action to put in place a regulatory regime that puts right some anomalies of the past. Previous Governments were perhaps quite lax or irresponsible in not creating a regulatory regime that protected consumers sufficiently.

Endowment policies to back mortgages were sold mainly by independent financial advisers or directly by lenders, but my hon. Friend rightly focused on the fact that a smaller proportion were sold by solicitors, and that practice was more common in Scotland than in England and Wales.

The regulatory landscape covering endowment sales is complicated. No regulation existed before April 1988, when the Financial Services Act 1986 came into effect. Investment sales were then regulated by the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation—a self-regulatory body set up under the Securities and Investment Board. However, solicitors who engaged in selling financial services products such as endowments were excluded from such regulation on the basis that they were already self-regulated under the Law Society of England and Wales and the Law Society of Scotland.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, the situation changed as a result of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, which regulated persons engaged in giving investment advice. The FSMA came into effect on 1 December 2001, but given our legislative traditions, one difficulty, as she said, is that the Act is not retrospective. Understandably, Governments have always been reluctant to go down the retrospection route. This Government introduced the FSMA to tackle a recognised problem. Our approach to financial services has been based largely on the principle that consumers should be able to secure a fair deal in all circumstances. That is why we set up the Financial Services Authority and why we legislated and acted to deliver a fairer, more equitable system.

As I have said to my hon. Friend, I have great sympathy for the people who have been detrimentally affected by endowment mis-selling in Scotland. We recognise that there is a genuine problem with endowment policies purchased through a solicitor in Scotland prior to introduction of the FSMA. However, it was partly because of that difficult situation that change was demanded, and we responded to that clamour for change.

The specific situation on which the debate focuses was resolved with the introduction of the FSMA, and investment advice complaints originating from 1 December 2001 can now be taken to the Financial Ombudsman Service. From June 1991, as hon. Members know, the Law Society of Scotland had the power to award compensation in addition to the refund of fees. As my hon. Friend said, however, that was capped at £1,000. In that respect, provisions relating to inadequate professional advice from solicitors in Scotland are set by the Scottish Executive, as are the rules on the burden of proof. If the £1,000 limit continues to be an issue, it will need to be taken up in that context.

We accept, of course, that the regulation of financial services must be rigorous and effective. With the FSA, not to mention the Financial Ombudsman Service and the financial services compensation scheme, we have put in place a new regime, which protects far more consumers.

Sandra Osborne: I take on board what my hon. Friend says and I appreciate the huge step forward in the legislation, but does he agree that that is no consolation to people in Scotland who have no access to compensation?

Mr. Lewis: There is only one answer to my hon. Friend—it is, of course, no consolation to people who were disadvantaged under the previous regime. However, it is important to put it on record in such debates that the Government have not been laissez-faire in responding to the scandals that have beset the industry. Such scandals have damaged not only the industry's reputation and credibility, but, more importantly, many consumers in our society. It is important to say that the Government are not blasé or laissez-faire about the issue and that we understand its importance. The more difficult issue is retrospection, which has always been a problem for Governments. We are not in denial about the effects on people in Scotland.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): Like every other Member, I have spoken to constituents who have been mis-sold endowment policies, but far and away the biggest problem lies with solicitors. People are facing large shortfalls, and I know of a case in which someone took out a £35,000 endowment policy over 25 years that is coming in at about £17,000 or £18,000. That is typical, and we are only beginning to see the tip of the iceberg of mis-selling by solicitors.

Mr. Lewis: Clearly, it is important that I, as a Minister, make statements that are evidence based, and there is emerging evidence on issues regarding solicitors. Historically, the role of solicitors seems to have been more prevalent in Scotland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom. There should be a debate among Scottish parliamentarians—whether in the Scottish Executive, the Scottish Parliament or the House of Commons—on the regulatory regime governing solicitors.

Where self-regulation is the predominant regulatory framework, there will, understandably, always be suspicions that it is not as tough as it should be. The question then is whether to go for legislation or Government intervention, or to urge the self-regulator to take their responsibilities more seriously. If mis-selling is causing concern in this area of public policy, hon. Members should perhaps seek urgent discussions with the Law Society of Scotland about what it proposes to do to meet its responsibilities. The Government would be reluctant to interfere in the self-regulatory regime at this stage, but self-regulation is a privilege, not a right, and we should always make that point in such circumstances.

Sandra Osborne: I believe that the Scottish Executive are introducing legislation to set up a body that will be independent of the Law Society and lawyers, with a majority of lay people on the board. Again, however, it is unclear how that will help people in this case.

Mr. Lewis: I suspect that it will not directly help people in this case, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) said, there is an ongoing issue as regards solicitors and concerns have been expressed, so we are talking about not only what has happened historically, but accountability and transparency now.

There are no easy answers to the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock has raised. The fact is that a significant number of people have been disadvantaged in Scotland as a result of the lax, inappropriate regulatory regime that existed before. I cannot satisfy my hon. Friend today by giving a commitment to change the situation retrospectively, but I am willing to meet her and colleagues to consider the issues in the context of Scotland and to see whether anything can be done.

In debates such as this, we should not give people false hope or build their expectations, but we certainly have a responsibility to take seriously what has happened to them and to engage with their elected representatives.

QinetiQ

1 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce a debate on the controversial issue of QinetiQ. It will centre on recent events, from the public-private partnership that took effect at the end of 2002 through to the privatisation—or the public offering of shares—during the past couple of months. The issue is controversial not simply because I say so; two of the Minister's predecessors in the Department have made similar comments. Lord Moonie, whom I remember as a balanced, calm Minister, said that he was extremely "unhappy" about this process, while Lord Gilbert said it was no less than "a scandal".

Some of the issues involved will be dealt with in the context of a National Audit Office investigation, which I sought and which has now been agreed. The matter is sufficiently serious to have it raised early and on the Floor of the House. As the Ministry of Defence has rushed to tell us, the NAO inquiry is routine. The time scale involved—by the end of this year—is fairly leisurely, but the issue is more important than that, which is why I sought this debate. It is important not just in itself, but because of the extent to which it may set a precedent for how privatisations of comparable organisations take place. The United Kingdom Hydrographic Office is due to be floated in a similar way and a similar approach is under discussion in relation to the Forensic Science Service.

I want to make it clear that I have no ideological, dogmatic problem with PPPs or with privatisation of this type of enterprise. As it happens, my Twickenham constituency is home to the National Physical Laboratory and the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, which was privatised through a management buy-out. The National Physical Laboratory remains in public ownership, but there is a management agreement with Serco and also a private finance initiative. Both those organisations are successful, and I am all for encouraging such collaboration, but serious problems and questions have arisen in the case of QinetiQ.

I will start by discussing a few background elements. QinetiQ emerged from the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. We are talking about half a century of scientific research done in our national security interests. It produced, among other things, radar during the war, microwave radar, carbon fibre, liquid crystal displays, flat-panel systems, 4,000 patents and 8,000 or more highly qualified scientists. It is a considerable national asset. There has been a sensible move to put it on a more commercial footing: splitting off DERA from the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory—the Government-owned side of the laboratories; the decision in 2001 to create a limited company, and therefore commercial freedom; the subsequent move to a PPP; and the flotation.

Before I put my questions to the Minister, some of which I have tabled in writing, it might be useful to summarise, without comment, the key facts at the centre of this matter. There are issues concerning the PPP at the end of 2002. The first relates to the sale of 34 per cent.—later reduced to 31 per cent.—of the company's equity to the Carlyle group. That was purchased in the form of £40 million of equity backed up by a loan of £150 million—an interest-bearing note.

Secondly, there was substantial employee share participation, notably by senior management. I believe that Sir John Chisholm had a 2 per cent. share and Mr. Graham Love, then the company's finance officer, 1.6 per cent. A 50 per cent. stake remained with the Government. The other key element of the PPP package was the long-term partnering agreement that was reached and announced on the same day as the Carlyle group's strategic acquisition. It involved a 25-year contract, £223 million a year in revenue and a cost of more than £5.6 billion. We are talking about a major Government contract for QinetiQ in support of that project.

At the beginning of this year, the public offering took place and 49 per cent. of the company was sold. It would appear that about £1.25 billion was raised. What is the problem? The accusation that has been made—I put this as a question rather than an assertion, because there are many unresolved issues—is that for a modest sum the Government effectively gave away a substantial part of a public asset to a company and to senior executives who took on virtually no risk.

The balance of risk and reward is at the heart of PPPs and the argument is that the balance was seriously disturbed on this occasion. The Carlyle group made about 10 times its original investment—the relevant figures are £40 million and £400 million—in three years. To single out the largest example, Sir John Chisholm increased his stake from about £129,000 to £26 million, which represents a multiple of almost 200. In the trade, that process is called ratcheting. The people I have talked to in the trade are shocked by the extent to which the gains were ratcheted.

It is accepted that a privatisation—a flotation of this kind—will produce substantial returns to the people involved. A factor of 10 was regarded as probably reasonable for somebody such as a chief executive in this context. However, a multiple of 200 was regarded as wildly extreme—not to mention obscene—and has caused great concern within the company and outside. The other aspect of the criticism involves whether the Government got value for money. Of course, they realised a substantial amount of cash and retain an equity stake, but the question whether they got value for money is different.

In the time remaining, I want to pose a series of specific questions to the Minister. He will know where I am coming from because I have already put some of them to him in writing. First, what exactly was the process by which Carlyle acquired its strategic 34 per cent. stake in the company with relatively little money—£40 million in equity—and virtually no risk? Indeed, some more thoughtful commentators, such as Patience Wheatcroft in The Times, have suggested that the money at risk as a result of the financial deals involved came to as little as £14 million. Be the sum £14 million or £40 million, how it multiplied to £400 million remains an issue.

The Government, in explaining their role, claimed on a webpage called "Combating 'Urban Myths'" that the way the Carlyle PPP operated was as follows:

"Best value for money was secured through an open and competitive auction between about 40 serious potential investors."

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

I have talked to some of those potential investors and they have no recollection of any such process having taken place in the way the Government described. Indeed, I received an e-mail from one of them. Such people are reluctant to be named because they do other Government business, and I hope that we can take things at their worth.

That person's company was trying to put together a competing bid. He said that he was firmly told that at least £200 million would be required and that his company should be prepared to go considerably higher. At no stage was it ever suggested that his company could get away with putting up £40 million backed by a loan. There might have been a misunderstanding, but any such misunderstanding would be serious because it led to a substantial number of potential bidders not participating.

That leads to the question of what were the criteria by which Carlyle was selected. They clearly revolved around the amount of money and the amount of money in the form of equity, but other criteria were involved. Another potential bidder told me that when they talked to the Ministry of Defence it was made clear to them that they should not put in a bid that did not include retaining the services of Sir John Chisholm, who was then chief executive. I do not know whether that is true—this may or may not be a good point to make; the man may be a genius for all I know—but he clearly made a personal fortune out of this transaction. There is an issue about whether that was a key criterion. Was there an issue about the stake to be acquired by the strategic partner?

What was the connection with the rifle range contract—a massive Ministry of Defence contract of over 25 years giving a complete monopoly in respect of MOD rifle ranges? That is what made the Carlyle deal so attractive; it could acquire loans from the banks on the back of the income stream that would come from the QinetiQ deal on the rifle ranges. Again, the Government's view is that this was done through an entirely competitive process, but I have spoken to someone in one of the leading British companies involved in this area of business, who says:

"Although QinetiQ claims to have won this contract, it was in fact awarded without competition, presumably because it would fatten up QinetiQ before sale. A number of other contractors"—

he mentions his own—

"would dearly love to have bid for it."

There is clearly an enormous misunderstanding—or worse—about the basis on which the competition took place. The best way to deal with that would be for the Government to set out how the competition took place, what the ground rules were and how the decision was made.

The next question is, why was QinetiQ sold when it was? It was sold two years after the dotcom bubble, at which point prices in hi-tech markets had seriously collapsed, and before the recovery, which has led to substantial appreciation in such share values. That is the issue on which Lord Moonie has focused his attention:

"We should not have sold it at the bottom of the market . . . They could have held off for a couple of years. Geoff was neutral"— he was talking about the former Secretary of State for Defence, who is now Leader of the House—

"but eventually he accepted the argument we must sell it. The Treasury was pushing that."

That is recorded in the national press. Therefore, there is an issue about why the decision was made to sell at that time, with the obvious implication that the company, and therefore the Government and the taxpayer, thereby realised substantially less than they could and should have done.

The next question is a business question, but it relates to the Government because they were the principal shareholder: how much of the increase in the value of the PPP was due to the strategic partners and the chief executive? How much did they contribute to the adding of value and was that sufficient to justify the ratcheting of their returns? As far as I can piece together, the company roughly doubled in value after the PPP—its value rose by about £600 million to £1.25 million. There are doubts about what the base was; I have a parliamentary answer saying that the company was valued at £312 million at that time. I guess that there was a difference in the basis of the valuation.

Let us say for the moment that the company doubled in value, because that appears to be what happened. It doubled in value for several reasons that were completely unconnected with the strategic partner or the activities of the top management. First, the stock market appreciated in value by 45 per cent. Therefore, there was serendipity. Also, the Government agreed to guarantee the pension fund, which was in deficit by over £100 million. The Government provided working capital, too; that was repaid of course, so there was no cost to the taxpayer, but an opportunity cost was involved.

Furthermore, substantial sums of money were raised not through the strategic activities of the new partner, but simply by selling property. Approximately £150 million was raised by selling property, and the annexes to the flotation, which I have before me, suggest that QinetiQ is a very wealthy property company. It has property assets of well over £300 million in net book value, let alone market value, and a great deal of the value of the company is vested in property. There was also the contribution of the rifle range contract.

If we put all that together, we have a conclusion that is best summarised not in my words, but in those of Lord Gilbert. He said, echoing my view entirely, that while he has "no objections to the workings of a capitalist system where a man takes big risks and makes big rewards, in this case the people at the top of the tree took virtually no risks.

All the value was built up by public servants using public money. I consider it a complete outrage . . . a scandal."

One could be pragmatic and say, "Well, okay, maybe they did make too much money, but it has all worked out well because the taxpayer has also made a lot of money." That may well be true—it is for the NAO inquiry to establish—but I would simply say that that is difficult to establish, because we need to establish the counter-factual case: what would have happened if the PPP had not gone ahead, or if it had gone ahead with a different partner?

We cannot answer that question, but what we do know is that although the Government have realised a lot of cash, they have also made major guarantees and commitments, and public assets have been sold that could have been sold in any event. It is very clear to me and to many other people who have looked into this matter that the Government did not realise anything remotely like the value for money that this project could have realised. Ultimately, however, it is for the NAO to assess that.

To move on to another matter, how and why were the senior managers, non-executive directors and others able to establish the formula from which they have made such great personal fortunes out of this privatisation? I have referred to the case of Sir John Chisholm; I could have referred to several other people. It is important to establish this: despite their claims to the contrary, this was virtually a risk-free commitment. They have argued in the press that if the shares they bought—in Sir John Chisholm's case worth £129,000—had dropped in value after the PPP, they would have lost money. Of course, technically there was a risk. However, it is inconceivable in view of the Government's commitment to this company, plus the rifle range contract and the guarantees, that it could have lost value.

There is also an issue in respect of why the chief executive—and then the chairman, as he became—was allowed to lock in an arrangement whereby he could multiply his investment by a factor of 200. That is absolutely extraordinary.

Lord Gilbert is clearly very exercised by this matter; he has tabled questions in the other place that are designed to get to the bottom of it. For example, he asked who appointed this man as chairman. We must remember that he is a chairman who is presiding over public assets. The answer was that he was appointed by Carlyle, the American company that had acquired the strategic stake. Lord Gilbert also asked about who determined the terms under which the chairman and other senior executives acquired their shares. Apparently, that was not the Government; it was the company, because it had been incorporated since 2001. Those are very serious issues. Lord Gilbert is doing us a service by raising these questions, and I want to pursue them in this place, too.

There are other issues to do with the way senior executives of this company profited from the privatisation. About 7 per cent. of the shares were allocated to the top 250 to 300 managers and 6 per cent. to the rest of the work force. There is enormous disgruntlement in the work force, and particularly in the trade union, because company managers have, down to a fairly lowly level, been allowed privileged access to stock options from which they have benefited enormously, but the scientists, including the most senior ones, have not had access to that scheme. They have had a free offer of £500 of shares, which has of course produced some money for them, but the terms of this arrangement are highly inequitable, and I believe that it was approved by the MOD.

To give the Minister time to reply, I shall raise only one further set of questions, although there are a great many others I could raise. This final question aroused considerable interest in the financial pages of the newspapers: why was this offering not made available to the ordinary public—the Sids? The Minister has not had oversight of this matter, but the Minister with responsibility for it, Lord Drayson, said:

> "This is a very complex business and providing an explanation to the public was going to be too complicated and expensive".

Therefore, the offer was to be made to institutions rather than to the public. However, the availability of the offering was changed and the public were allowed to buy into it through stockbrokers, but on a rather belated and disadvantageous basis.

A lot of analysis has been done that suggests that the reason for this—a cost of £20 million—was wildly overstated. For example, there was no need to give a shareholder discount, and the use of the internet would have greatly reduced the cost. There were many mechanisms by which the Government could have insisted, had they wished to do so, that shares be made available to the general public, so that they could have profited along with Carlyle and the senior executives. However, the Government did not choose to take that route and the magic circle of institutional investors has effectively scooped the pool.

There are many other questions, but I will not go on any longer. I will pursue the answers to them through freedom of information requests and parliamentary questions, as I want to give the Minister time to reply to at least some of my questions.

1.20 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on obtaining time for this debate. I will try to be as balanced as my previous Ministry of Defence colleague, Lord Moonie, but the hon. Gentleman has not been wholly balanced himself, given the amount of time that he took. He has left me with less time in which to respond.

Let me start from the headline—the top issue. Although I am not the Minister who dealt with the issue, I am corporately responsible as an MOD Minister. However, anything I say, I firmly believe in, so it is not that I am simply coming along and giving the MOD's position. These things are weighted and considered.

The recent initial public offering of QinetiQ was a real success for the taxpayer. It demonstrated the success of the Government's public-private partnership policy, through which QinetiQ was transformed from an in-house research and development organisation into an international defence and security company that develops cutting-edge technology for our armed forces.

Why do I say that? The Government have received some £600 million since the start of the PPP process and retain a stake in the company worth some £250 million—that is more than their total stake in QinetiQ in 2003; the hon. Gentleman glossed over that. The IPO met the Government's objective of achieving maximum value for the taxpayer while being consistent with a stable after-market. It raised net receipts of £347 million for the taxpayer, of which £250 million—72 per cent.—was ploughed back into defence to meet defence priorities. That demonstrates the validity of our overall approach to the PPP, and I note that he said that he is not hostile to such an approach.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

The PPP was one of the recommendations of the 1998 strategic defence review. At that time, it was judged that the in-house Defence Evaluation and Research Agency faced external challenges and needed to change if it was to continue to provide the armed forces with the technology that they required. The aims of the PPP—as they always are, in a sense—were to introduce private sector capital and expertise into the company to allow it to meet its investment needs and develop its capabilities, and to enhance opportunities for the commercial exploitation of taxpayers' investment in science and technology.

However, we considered some elements of DERA's work to be too sensitive to be put into the private sector. That is why in 2001 we split the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory, which was to remain within Government and undertake that most sensitive work. At that time, QinetiQ was vested as a wholly Government-owned company.

The original intention was to float QinetiQ on the stock market, but we took specialist advice, made a careful analysis of what was best, and decided that the Government's objective of securing long-term value for the taxpayer would be better met through the introduction of a strategic partner to work with management to develop and grow the business. We therefore ran an open competition for such a strategic partner, and after about 40 initial expressions of interest we selected 12 companies to produce indicative bids. That is not quite the flavour of the story that the hon. Gentleman tried to portray.

Carlyle won the competition, as it was judged that its bid offered the best deal for the taxpayer. The Government received £150 million from the final deal. Carlyle's valuation was benchmarked against other comparable companies. The hon. Gentleman says that he has had representations from one company and from other sources, and says that there must have been a whole layer of misunderstanding, but it was an open process; who misunderstood who? I would claim that it was not the MOD who misunderstood. It was open in its approach.

I take some exception to the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the company—I assume that it is a reputable company, otherwise it would not have been in that territory—is worried about raising its concerns about that time because it is still doing business with the MOD. The imputation is that we would somehow punish such a company. I do not accept that for one moment. He should be careful when making those outrageous charges. If the company said that, and if it has evidence, it should bring it to Ministers, and we will deal with it; otherwise, it should stop running hares and making claims that have no substance.

A concern of Lord Moonie's that the hon. Gentleman raised was why we did not delay the process. That, of course, was one of the balanced judgments that was made. The background is that the markets were low at the time, and we took advice on whether to delay the sale. However, we judged that delaying would not have been in the Government's interest, in terms of achieving our goal of maximising value for the taxpayer over the longer term, as it would have delayed the transformation of the company. In any event, there was no guarantee that market conditions would improve. We had learned the lessons from previous privatisations; that is why we sold only 34 per cent. of the ordinary equity, ensuring that the taxpayer, as majority shareholder, would keep the largest share of any future growth in QinetiQ.

Since 2003, Carlyle's input has been crucial in the development of the company's business strategy. It provides expertise in bringing technology to market and a detailed understanding of the important US market, and that has resulted in a significant increase in value for the shareholders. That is why I say that the PPP strategy has proved a great success, and it has been suggested that it could be a model for future privatisations.

In the three years since Carlyle became our strategic partner, QinetiQ has positioned itself as a leading international defence and security company with important acquisitions in the US and Europe. Does the hon. Gentleman want to recognise that measure of success? If so, I look forward to his making a submission to that effect. The measure of what we did is its subsequent success, and we can say, with significant credibility, that what we did stands full examination.

There are issues relating to the proceeds of the PPP. It was not driven by purely financial considerations, but the result has proved to be excellent value for money for the taxpayer. If the Government had sold their entire stake in QinetiQ in 2002, we would have received £230 million, but we have received £600 million, and there is still more to be obtained. It is against that measure that the hon. Gentleman should raise his questions, and if he comes to the same conclusions as we did, he would say that the PPP was a success.

Another question asked is why Carlyle paid only £42 million—it was not £40 million; I noted that the hon. Gentleman discounted it to £40 million on the basis of one press report—for a third share in a company now worth £1.3 billion. Carlyle's acquisition was financed by a combination of bank debt and its own equity, as is standard practice in private equity deals of that type. The £42 million refers only to Carlyle's equity investment. In total, the Government received £150 million in proceeds from the PPP but, as I said, they have retained a majority stake in the business. Since the PPP, the company's profits have more than doubled and the stock market value of defence businesses has also risen. I put that down to the careful management of how we are projecting our needs as a Department, and to trying to establish the best relationship with companies and their employees. All of that is proving successful, so we can take some credit for that, too.

As for the question about why retail investors were not allowed to participate, many of them did so. The Government's main objective was to obtain value for money for all taxpayers, not just those who could afford to buy shares. For that reason, supported by advice from our City experts, we decided against a full retail offer and instead had an institutional offer, as part of which private client stockbrokers were able to apply for shares on behalf of their clients. I am pleased to say that, in the event, the allocation represented 6 per cent. of the total offered. It is not correct to say that the sector was somehow completely ignored.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about what he believed to be the undue profits taken by individuals. He should have followed the matter more closely, because there is a lock-up agreement that restricts the proportion of shares that senior managers can sell over the next three years. That also applies to Sir John Chisholm. The throwaway comment that Sir John made oodles of money is not a fact. Sir John has been at the helm of the organisation since 1991, seeing it through its transformation from a plethora of publicly owned Government laboratories to a successful private sector business. He was not suddenly plucked out of the air by Carlyle; he has a track record of success and I find it unacceptable to hear him diminished in that way.

BBC World Service (Thai Service)

1.30 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to introduce this short debate on the BBC World Service Thai service. I am equally delighted that the Minister for the Middle East is replying to the debate. There are two types of Ministers: those who attend an Adjournment debate and read a well prepared script and those rare Ministers who are prepared to engage in the arguments.

I will make a small, simple request of the Minister towards the end of my remarks, which I hope he will pass on to Lord Triesman, the Minister responsible, who sits in another place.

I want to put this debate about the BBC World Service Thai service in context. As we debate the Thai service, for the fourth evening in a row in Bangkok, there are massive demonstrations. Some 50,000 people were on the streets around the Prime Minister's office on Sunday and 10,000 were there yesterday. The Prime Minister has called a general election for April, which the major Opposition parties are threatening to boycott. That is the context. Democracy in Thailand is in some doubt and great debates are going on in that country.

For the past 60 years, the BBC World Service Thai service, almost uninterrupted, has been adding to that debate and, in the traditional role of the BBC, has been helping to keep the domestic broadcasters and media honest. However, in January the Thai service was cut, so there is no reporting on the BBC Thai service about possibly the most momentous political events in Thailand since 1992.

Just down the road in Lancaster house, as we are speaking, delegates from all over the world, including from national Governments and the World Bank, are attending Asia 2015, a conference hosted by the Department for International Development. This morning, the delegates were discussing voice and choice. It is such a pity that people in Thailand no longer have the choice to listen to the voice of the BBC Thai service. Clearly, DFID and, I am sure, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office would agree that Asia 2015 is important for the region and is something that the BBC should be involved in.

Where did the idea to cut the BBC World Service Thai service after 60 years come from? I like to think of myself as a fairly assiduous watcher of statements about the BBC in the House—I chair the all-party group on the BBC—but I thought that I perhaps missed something that was announced in the past year. I looked back to the Green Paper published last year, which said:

> "The World Service, in consultation with the FCO, needs to consider a radical and creative reprioritisation of its vernacular output to take account of these shifts in global political and economic priorities."

It went on to say:

> "The aspiration towards democracy, respect for human rights, freedom of speech and association, which had been the BBC's rationale for developing Eastern European vernacular services, has now shifted eastwards and southwards, and in particular to the Middle East, the Far East and parts of Africa and the sub-continent."

Anyone reading that a year or so ago could reasonably have expected that, given that the priorities were moving eastwards, the BBC Thai service would be safe. There was some mention in that document of the BBC World Service wanting to develop an Arabic language TV service, in consultation with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Indeed, the cuts in the BBC World Service Thai service and others will help to finance that Arabic language TV service.

It is worth saying that in the Green Paper it was recognised that "The challenges are enormous,"— that is, the challenges of establishing an Arabic language TV service—

"however, any new grant-in-aid funded operation will find it hard to compete for audiences against local competitors, and other established global broadcast operators", presumably, al-Jazeera, and so on. It is recorded in the Green Paper that the BBC asked the FCO to fund the Arabic language TV service, but received a negative answer.

The next thing we heard in the House of Commons or the House of Lords—the next record of any mention of the cut—was in a letter from Nigel Chapman of the World Service to the Committee Clerk of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, dated 24 October 2005, a useful document that was the BBC World Service's contribution to the Committee's debates about the FCO's annual report. That letter mentions, in passing, the cuts to the vernacular services and says that those are to finance the Arabic TV service. Nigel Chapman finishes by saying:

"The paper was endorsed by the BBC Board of Governors on 20th October. Consultations have also been held with the FCO about the proposed changes. The Foreign Secretary has given written approval, as he is obliged to do under the Broadcasting Agreement, for the proposed investment in Arabic TV and the proposed service reductions."

When the letter was written, the decision was already signed and sealed by the BBC board of governors and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which is why I feel justified in putting that decision under some scrutiny, particularly given the change in political traditions that have occurred in Thailand during the intervening period.

I should mention that I do not doubt that the Government have invested heavily in the BBC World Service over the last financial period. In 2005–06, the financial year that is coming to an end, £239 million was invested in the BBC World Service. In real terms, that compares with about £215 million in 1995–95, after which period there was a sudden drop for a couple of years. There has been a significant increase since then—although not an enormous one—which I hope could be sustained in the next spending review.

It is worth drawing the Chamber's attention to the report by the Lords Select Committee on Review of the BBC Charter, which made two recommendations about the Arabic language channel. It said:

"However, a 12-hour limit on the Arabic language channel's broadcasting time will mean the BBC competing for audiences with one hand tied behind its back. We recommend that the Government should immediately provide the BBC World Service with the required £6 million to establish a 24-hour Arabic channel."

It continued:

"We recommend that as part of the comprehensive review of the BBC's international services the BBC World Service should continue to consider the need to provide television services beyond the Arabic language service. Further expansion may prove to be important but should not be dependent on cuts to existing radio services"— as we have seen in this instance. It is worth remembering that, at the moment, the budget for the Arabic language TV service is about £19 million, for 12 hours a day. Channel 4 news has about £20 million to do 1.5 hours a day. Clearly, resources would be at a premium for the BBC Arabic TV service.

I return to the main focus of today's debate: the BBC Thai service. The BBC considered three criteria in cutting the services, and the Thai service was one of nine or 10 that it cut. First, what is press freedom like in the countries concerned? Secondly, what about the geopolitical situation—what British or world interests are at stake? Thirdly, does anyone listen? What are the audience figures?

On press freedom, I looked at the annual worldwide press freedom index for 2005, produced by Reporters Without Borders, the most commonly accepted standard of whether a country has a free media. The United Kingdom is at number 24, for example. In 2002, Thailand was at 65 and in 2003 it dropped to 82 out of all the countries in the world. I looked at the figures for 2005 and there was no mention of Thailand on the first page. I turned to the second page and went past Serbia and Montenegro at 65, Burkina Faso at 78, and Burundi, at equal 90th with Venezuela—much beloved of the Prime Minister—right down to Thailand at 107, a little bit above Tajikistan, Rwanda and Bahrain. Why is that so? It is because community radio stations are being closed down, the Prime Minister is intimidating and suing journalists and there is a great deal of self-censorship.

Over many years, the BBC's presence in Thailand and in the Thai language has encouraged domestic journalists there to be brave. It was the BBC Thai service that first drew attention to the insurgency in the south of the country and enabled people in Bangkok and elsewhere to appreciate the significance of what was happening in their country. Incidentally, the BBC Thai service informed the wider BBC World Service and BBC journalists involved in domestic British output when events such as the tsunami happened.

What about the geopolitical situation? By referring to the London conference on Asia, I have demonstrated how important that region is. Thailand has a population of 60 million, the insurgency in the south has wide implications, Burma and Malaysia are nearby and the interplay between the various nations in that part of the world is extremely important to British interests and those of the wider world.

I turn to the crux of the matter—the audience figures, about which there is some dispute. The director of the World Service admits that, even on its figures, the audience has doubled from 0.8 per cent. to 1.6 per cent. of the entire market. However, I am told by ex-employees of the BBC Thai service that those figures are based on surveys by the Voice of America; I am informed by people who know about such things that the BBC has not commissioned an audience survey in Thailand for the past 12 years.

I turn to the markets in the individual parts of Thailand; Bangkok's is an example. In 2004, the BBC World Service website boasted that "The latest survey shows an increase in the World Service weekly audience in Bangkok. Total weekly reach is up from 2.4 per cent. in 2002 to 6 per cent. in 2004. The audience is mainly driven by Thai—weekly audiences in Thai have increased from 2 per cent. to 5.5 per cent. since 2002."

In other parts of Thailand, such as the university city of Khon Kaen in the north-east, the BBC Thai service had a weekly reach in Thai of 8.7 per cent. If the BBC were to cut services in London that had a lower than 8 per cent. or 6 per cent. reach, a number of BBC services—certainly BBC London—would not last beyond next week.

The BBC Thai service was listened to, as was shown not only by the BBC's boasts about its exposure, before it decided to cut the service, but by the situation in Thailand. A couple of weeks ago, an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation went to Thailand and was briefed by the ambassador on how damaging the cut was proving to Britain's reputation in Thailand. The Bangkok Post detailed the campaign that has led to demonstrations outside the British embassy, petitions and a website. Yongyud Wongpiromsarn, who organised one of the demonstrations, said:

"The BBC radio programme was not just a news programme. It's more like an on-air magazine suitable for every member of the family. Without the BBC Thai, the only thing my son would know about Great Britain was Manchester United and Arsenal".

Pitaya Srikotapetch, who is blind, came to the British embassy protest with a friend. He said:

"BBC Thai had helped widen our world view and knowledge on domestic and international affairs as it offered different insights that we could not find in local radio programmes".

He told his friends how good the BBC Thai programme was, and they were soon hooked. His friend, Pongthep Krachangtip, said:

"I don't want to lose the BBC Thai programme and I really hope it will be kept alive. I have done my best to fight the planned suspension of the service but, as you know, I am just an ordinary guy. I wonder what more I can do to help the service".

Many more people are against the cut: professors from the universities, the Thai Senate Committees on Social Development and Human Security and on Foreign Affairs and an ex-Prime Minister. There is an extraordinary statement from the international academic community, signed by academics from around the world. It states:

"We believe that this decision gravely underestimates the importance of the service for Thai audiences, the BBC and British interests . . . Audiences in Thailand have long held the BBC Thai service in high regard."

As a final demonstration of the power of the BBC Thai service, I cite two letters from The Times. Philip Stott of the Anglo-Thai society wrote

"It is . . . disastrous for the UK, when the British Chamber of Commerce in Bangkok has grown to be second only to that of the US and the countries of the Pacific Rim are rising in economic and political influence."

A Ms Methasate, who grew up in Bangkok, wrote:

"Politics aside, Britain will also lose one of its most treasured and well-loved cultural ambassadors. Gone will be English by Radio, one of the reasons why tens of thousands of Thai students come to this country, and Book Talk, a programme dedicated to promoting British writers and publications, not to mention the highly praised news bulletins that only the BBC can provide."

What can be done? In summation, I say two things on that. The BBC World Service and Nigel Chapman had the grace to tell me that, of all the vernacular services, the decision to cut the Thai service was the most difficult and the one they had to think hardest about. It was the most marginal decision, and it involved about £700,000 to £800,000 in total. If they had to think hardest about that service before deciding to cut it last summer, how much harder would they have to think if the decision were being made now, when there is potential revolution on the streets of Bangkok, and, as I have said, the future course of democracy there is at stake? I certainly back the requests from the BBC World Service for further resources in the future. However, it should listen to its critical friends in this House, who do not challenge its entire strategy, but ask it to think again on this one issue.

I say to the Minister, and through him to Lord Triesman, that this debate has been on the Order Paper for about the past week, and I have had one or two phone calls from Foreign Office officials asking what I was going to say. I told them that I was happy as an elected MP to discuss that with the noble Lord responsible, but not with an official—that would have spoiled the fun of these occasions.

Anyway, I waited and waited. Yesterday I came into my office and my intern said, "The Minister's office has rung." I was delighted; I thought that parliamentary democracy had been in action. In fact, it was the office of the Minister for Schools, who wants to speak to me on another pressing matter. I then thought that, if the Foreign and Commonwealth Office cannot be bothered to ring back, why should I?

I am sure that it was an oversight. Tonight, I am attending a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association reception, which Lord Triesman is hosting at Downing street, and I intend to have a little word with him. However, all I ask is that Nigel Chapman and the noble Lord come to have a cup of tea with me next week so that I can make the case directly to them that this decision should be reviewed. I hope that at the very least I can leave this debate knowing that the Foreign Office is willing to come with the BBC World Service and hear the case for a review of the decision.

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): As ever, Mr. Hood, it is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship. It occurs to me that 20 years ago neither of us would have guessed that we would have been in this situation.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) and congratulate him on bringing this important debate to the House. We all know that the BBC World Service has a special place in this country's affections. I throw a little spanner in the works by saying that I hope that it is not going to change its theme tune, which has sustained me through many a bleak morning in sandy places.

The World Service has a global audience of about 150 million people and it enjoys trust ratings that politicians can only envy. Its reputation and success have been earned over 70 years and are a credit to the journalists and staff who work there and, of course, to this country and this Government. We all benefit from my hon. Friend's passionate interest in the BBC and the services it provides. I consider the BBC to be the world's premier broadcaster; I doubt whether any other provides such range and excellence.

The World Service's aim, which has been stated on many occasions, is to be the best known and most respected voice in international broadcasting. However, competition is stronger than it has ever been, and new technology is driving the pace of change. To meet the new challenges, the World Service has evolved into a multi-media broadcaster. It is no longer simply a short wave radio broadcaster. Its output includes radio, online services and, from 2007, television. To maintain its success, it must continue to evolve by taking into account new technologies, changing audience demands, where it is most needed and where it can have the greatest impact.

I shall come a little later to the point raised by my hon. Friend about audiences. I remember from my days as a Minister at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport that I never found two people who could agree on how big or small audiences were, or on the best method for measuring them, but I certainly take his point.

Against that background, the World Service conducted a review of its vernacular language services that resulted in a strategic reprioritisation, as it was called, which was announced in October 2005. The main changes were the closure of 11 radio services, new investment in online services and, as my hon. Friend mentioned, the planned launch of an Arabic TV service. Those changes were proposed by the World Service itself—they were not imposed by the Government. However, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office welcomed them in a written statement by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 25 October 2005.

I stress that the reprioritisation was not a cost-driven exercise. Every penny saved from the closure of services has been reinvested in the World Service. It will receive £245 million of public funding this year. That is a huge amount of money. As my hon. Friend hinted, I am not the Minister who usually deals with these issues. When somebody put that figure on my desk, my hand began to shake. I wondered what my bit of the FCO could do with £245 million. However, it is certain that nothing could be better than spending it on the World Service, which in so many ways is a great representative of this country, its culture and its belief in democracy and freedom.

As my hon. Friend said, before closing services, the World Service undertakes repeated analysis of their reach and impact, and the availability of alternative sources of independent news and information. The Thai service is one of those that was closed. The others were mostly in central and eastern Europe. The Thai service closed in January, and as I understand it, the decision was not taken lightly.

In the 62 years since the World Service Thai service was established, Thailand and its relationship with the UK have changed beyond recognition. Thirty or 40 years ago, as my hon. Friend said, Thailand was a very different place. It was caught up in the cold war and suffered from domestic instability and successive military coups. But Thailand and south-east Asia have changed markedly. Once a zone of instability, much of it—not all of it, but much of it—has become a zone of dynamism.

As current events illustrate, and despite all the concerns and threats mentioned by my hon. Friend, which we must take seriously, Thailand remains one of the liveliest democracies in the region. I understand that there is an ongoing debate about the role of the media in Thai society, but the country has a vibrant and diverse press. Thanks to the revolution of satellite and internet communications, Thais also have access to a broad range of domestic and international media outlets. The BBC played its part in informing Thais and shaping their views over several crucial decades in the country's political and social development, and it can be proud of that contribution.

A key factor in the decision to close the Thai service was its small audience. I heard what my hon. Friend said about the disputes about the exact size of the listenership in Thailand, but it is clear that it was relatively small. Thais no longer relied on the World Service for their news and information. The BBC figures were based on repeated measurements. Some were higher, some were lower, but the evidence was clear that the audience was low compared with other World Service services; indeed, it was 38th out of the 42 vernacular services provided by the World Service. On average, only 1.2 per cent. of Thais listened to it. My hon. Friend disputed that figure.

The service was no longer viable when judged against the World Service's other priorities, but I reassure my hon. Friend that closure of the Thai language service does not signal the end of the BBC's broadcasting to Thailand. The country will continue to receive the English language radio service and online services, and BBC World television is available to cable and satellite viewers. The demand in Thailand for English language services has grown in recent years, and UK-Thai relations, which are based on our vibrant commercial and cultural relationship, and on strong personal links that have grown up in recent years, will continue to be strong. The 750,000 British tourists who visit Thailand every year can testify to the depth of those relations.

My hon. Friend raised several important issues that are beyond those purely formal facts. He spoke about the importance of the Thai vernacular service to individuals, which I can understand. As a lifelong listener to the various programmes that the BBC uses to convey the thoughts of its listeners about all sorts of programmes, I know that people write passionately about BBC services. We only have to witness the current row over Radio 4's morning medley. I well remember how angry I felt when "Desert Island Discs" was shifted. Suddenly my Sundays and Fridays were not the same, until Parkinson came on. That is what I listen to now.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that all such bodies must reassess their priorities. I believe that the journalists who were affected by the closure of the Thai service have been very well looked after by the BBC. I made a special point of inquiring about that. It seems that they were well rewarded for the service that they provided, and they were given good redundancy packages if they did not have other jobs. Their expertise and professionalism were not cast aside or wasted. As I tried to make clear earlier, Thais will be afforded access to many other services, including, of course, the World Service.

The closure of vernacular radio services leads to redundancies at the World Service. Because of linguistic and regional expertise requirements, it is not always possible to reassign World Service staff internally. As I said, the terms and conditions were satisfactorily agreed between the World Service and the trade unions, and the BBC is confident that the changes will not affect the quality of its news gathering operation.

I know from when Broadcasting Bills have been taken through this House that MPs feel strongly about the issue. We all worry when news gathering and news broadcasting headquarters and services are centralised and taken out of our region or constituency, and we are right to worry about that. If Lord Triesman or I had thought that this decision would result in a degradation of services to Thailand, we would have put up some resistance to the World Service's proposal.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watts.]

9.30 am

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I am pleased to have obtained this opportunity to debate human rights in central Asia, specifically the former Soviet republics known collectively as the "stans": Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Kazakhstan. I acknowledge the valuable assistance that I have received from bodies that have provided briefings for this debate, namely Christian Aid, Christian Solidarity Worldwide and Amnesty International.

In many ways, 90 minutes is barely adequate to deal with this subject and the range of human rights concerns regarding this region. Therefore, to allow others to participate in the debate, I shall restrict the focus of my remarks to the situation in Uzbekistan in particular, although I shall touch on Turkmenistan, and on religious freedom, which is of particular concern to me.

I shall try also to put human rights concerns into the broader politics of the region, because it seems that human rights problems common to all these central Asian countries are a symptom rather than the disease itself. They are symptomatic of the problem in countries that do not enjoy a great deal of political stability, because there is a tremendous amount of poverty in such countries, which has given rise to a fairly unpleasant class of despot in the region. When discussing human rights, it is important that we see the issue in its full and proper context and do not try to divorce it from the poverty issues in the region. I hope that in this age of joined-up government the Minister for Europe might convey a few of my concerns in that regard to his colleagues in the Department for International Development.

There are several characters in the region about whom I am inclined to think that Gilbert and Sullivan would be writing comic operas if were they alive and working today. Those characters are—I say this in no spirit of levity—grotesque caricatures of dictators. It is impossible not to find some amusement in a character such as President Niyazov in Turkmenistan, who modestly styles himself as the "father of all Turkmens", and who renamed the months and days after himself, his mother and various folklore heroes of the country. However, it is easy for me to say that it is impossible not to derive some amusement from such a person because my family are not being persecuted by such people, and my religious freedoms are not being curtailed. It is not me who, as a Christian, is being denied the right to visit and associate freely with other Christians, which is, of course, the situation in places such as Turkmenistan.

I move to the situation in Uzbekistan. I have had an interest in that country for several years for a variety of reasons. The Minister may know that I have long been interested in the abolition of the death penalty worldwide; the death penalty has been used as a particularly brutal instrument of oppression in Uzbekistan. It may send shivers down a few spines behind the Minister to know that some of my concerns were first brought to my attention by the former ambassador to Uzbekistan, Mr. Craig Murray, with whom I have been acquainted for 20-odd years since we were both students at different universities in Scotland.

I take as my starting point the Government's helpful annual human rights reports. Uzbekistan featured in the 2005 and 2004 reports as being an area of major concern. I love the Government's human rights reports: they have a real talent for taking the meanest grain of progress and embracing it with an optimism that I, as a Liberal Democrat, find truly heart-warming. Optimism should always be encouraged. They note that "some limited steps" have been taken in implementing the UN convention against torture, and highlight a speech made by President Karimov about his aspirations for democracy, but the bleak and depressing truth is that there is no concrete evidence of improvement and plenty of evidence of the continuation of widespread human rights abuses in that country. Torture and other forms of ill-treatment remain routine for those in custody. Indeed, torture is incentivised because confessions are routinely the basis for convictions in trials that are widely recognised to fall far short of any internationally recognised standards for such matters.

I shall talk about events in Andijan last May. This issue has been fairly well rehearsed in this place, but probably not well enough. The fact that the events of 12 and 13 May 2005 in Andijan have not created more outrage should cause deep embarrassment to all of us in this country. On those nights, a group of armed men attacked an army garrison prison in Andijan, which is part of Uzbekistan's densely populated and impoverished Fergana valley. A number of prisoners were reported to have been released, including 23 men who are currently on trial for belonging to the Akromiya religious movement. Armed men stormed the mayor's office and took police hostages. Reports suggest that a crowd of several thousand gathered in the city on 13 May, initially voicing support for the 23 accused but then calling for jobs, an end to corruption and injustice, and the president's resignation. Eye-witness reports, which have been suppressed by the Uzbek Government and are difficult to come by, suggest that toward the end of the afternoon, Uzbek troops fired indiscriminately on the crowds with live ammunition, using armoured personnel carriers. It has been suggested that about 500 people might have been killed, including women and children. We have no idea how many others might have been wounded.

I say in passing that the Minister might wish to consider, in the context of other legislation going through the House, whether those who originally stormed the prison and garrison in Andijan might be regarded as terrorists, and whether those of us who support their quite legitimate case might, at a later stage, be considered guilty of glorifying terrorism. I do not expect him to answer that point today, but I highlight it as something on which he might wish to ponder on another occasion and in another way.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Whatever one's view of the regime in Uzbekistan, one cannot be but appalled at the points that the hon. Gentleman made in his introductory comments that since Andijan discrimination against Christians has greatly increased, and that they have borne the brunt of the regime's anger about what happened. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Carmichael: Yes; I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. As a Christian, I have been struck by the theme that runs through virtually all the human rights oppressions in the central Asian republics. The Churches—not only the Christian Church but other religious groupings—are at the centre of resistance to the dictatorships. I think back to Malawi in the early 1990s, when the Catholic bishops and the central African Presbyterian Church were instrumental in bringing down Banda.

The flipside of that coin is that the Churches and religious groups suffer the hardest persecution. That has been a hallmark of events since the Andijan massacre. As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, it has affected Christian groups, other religious groups, journalists, human rights activists and ordinary citizens of no affiliation at all. Anyone who attracts any suspicion, whether there is any legitimacy to that, seems to be a legitimate target for repression in the eyes of the Uzbek Government. They have tried to close down any discussion or dissemination of information about events in Andijan. State-run media outlets provided limited coverage of the events as they unfolded, and there was no pictorial representation of them.

On 14 May, journalists who had been working for western news agencies, including the Institute for War and Peace Reporting and Reuters, were detained and forced to leave the city. Journalists from Russia's NTV and Ren TV were also detained and had equipment confiscated. Given the current relationship between Uzbekistan and Russia, that is even more remarkable.

Since the events of 13 May, independent journalists and human rights activists have reported a climate of fear in Andijan, with pressure on people not to talk to outsiders. Non-governmental organisations and human rights groups have received reports of detentions and house arrests, including that of Saidjahon Zainabuddinov, the head of Appeal, the human rights non-governmental organisation. He was an eye witness to events in Andijan. We are given to understand that he has been charged with calumny or slander, but again details are difficult to come by. Can the Minister tell us what the current situation is for Saidjahon Zainabuddinov? What progress has been made towards persuading the Uzbek Government to accept an independent international inquiry into the events in Andijan last May?

Further concerns mentioned in the annual report relate to the restriction on access to prisons; the lack of independence in the judicial system, with judges appointed by the president; widespread corruption; and the continued use of the death penalty. In 2004, Uzbekistan executed prisoners on death row whose cases were lodged with the United Nations human rights committee.

Also in 2004, I was privileged to chair a meeting in the House of Commons organised by Reprieve, the death penalty abolition group. Among others represented on that occasion was the Uzbek group Mothers Against the Death Penalty and Torture. In particular, Tamara Chikunova was present and her story was one of the most compelling and heart-rending stories that I have ever heard from someone who has been involved with the death penalty—of course, there are few pleasant ones. Tamara Chikunova's son was arrested, subjected to a mockery of a trial in Uzbekistan and sentenced to death. She visited him regularly in prison. She turned up one day as arranged and was told that she would not be allowed access to him and to come back two days later. She did so and was told that her son had been executed two days earlier—the very day on which she had been outside, waiting for him.

I often think that the appalling inhumanity of the death penalty comes from the prevalence of people remaining on death row for 15 or 20 years, as often happens in the United States. However, to use the death penalty at the other end of the scale, only weeks after conviction, takes inhumanity and barbarism, too. That story highlights the nature of the Uzbek regime.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Although we have to be careful about labelling all the "stans" and suggesting that all the human rights abuses are on the scale of those in Uzbekistan, does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the worst things in Uzbekistan, in addition to the treatment of prisoners and torture, is the secret trials—trials that the relatives of the accused do not even know are taking place—and the lack of proper access to legal representation for those accused of what are often trumped-up crimes? That is really the worst thing of all.

Mr. Carmichael: I cannot disagree. The hon. Gentleman has described features of a criminal justice system that breaches just about every internationally accepted norm of criminal justice standards. Justice should be done publicly. People should have a right to know the case against them. The judiciary should be properly independent of the Government. We take those things for granted, but the Uzbek Government in particular—I take the point about not labelling every "stan" according to Uzbekistan—almost seem to go out of their way to ignore them.

The Government's annual report mentions problems faced by members of Human Rights Watch with regard to the renewal of their visas, but there is not much of an update. Perhaps the Minister can say what the current situation is for NGOs such as Human Rights Watch that seek to operate in Uzbekistan but find themselves constrained in doing so.

I am aware that time is moving on, so I shall deal with religious freedom briefly; no doubt other hon. Members will do so in more detail. The reports of religious intolerance and persecution in Uzbekistan cause me significant concern. Discrimination, harassment and criminal prosecutions of Muslims and harassment of religious minorities, most notably Protestant Christians, remain commonplace. The trial of 23 men accused of being members of the banned Akromiya group and anti-constitutional activity led to the Andijan massacre. Can the Minister update us on the policy of critical engagement with Uzbekistan in respect of cases such as that?

Another concern that I shall touch on, which is not new, is the suggestion that information derived from torture has been used by this country. Again, I bring hon. Members' attention to the work of Craig Murray. He stated clearly that the Government have used information provided by states that practise torture. Steve Crawshaw of Human Rights Watch told the Foreign Affairs Committee that, in one of her submissions when questioned in the House of Lords on the use of information acquired through torture, Eliza Manningham-Buller as much as said, "We're not going to ask, because that would make things difficult." I hope that the Government's approach to the use of information from Uzbekistan has moved on from that rather bleak caricature and that the Minister will assure us that they will not use intelligence derived from the use of torture in Uzbekistan.

I said in my introductory remarks that I wanted to make the link between human rights abuses and poverty in the region. In doing so, I am again indebted to Christian Aid for its briefing. It is important to understand that the oppression of people in the central Asian republics is an economic as well as a human rights oppression. These are, for the most part, highly resource-rich countries, and that makes the fact that there is such poverty in them all the more appalling. The average per capita incomes in Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan are now lower than in sub-Saharan Africa. The average monthly salary in Tajikistan is $20. Across the region as a whole, life expectancy at birth fell from 68.2 years in 1990 to 64.7 years in 2003. Although some economic progress has been made in the past few years in Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan, that has not translated into improved living standards for ordinary people. A recent survey suggested that more than half of the poorest households in Tajikistan eat on average only one meal a day. One third of Tajik children are chronically malnourished, and economic migration among the male population of the region is leading to family collapse and increased vulnerability for women and children.

In view of the difficult governance issues in the region, will the Minister tell us how he envisages the UK Government's poverty reduction and political objectives there being met? Also, please will he impress on his ministerial colleagues at the Department for International Development the importance of increasing aid to the region, in line with DFID's increasing support to other developing regions?

Finally, I shall address changes at the United Nations. In August 2005, the UN General Assembly agreed to establish a human rights council to replace the UN Commission on Human Rights; it was said that the human rights council will assume the mandate of the Commission on Human Rights. It will have between 30 and 50 members, each of them elected on a geographical basis and for a period of three years by a two-thirds majority of the General Assembly. Each member will undertake to fulfil human rights standards and face evaluation under the review mechanism. We are told that the United Kingdom welcomes the establishment of the council, but it is of concern that the US ambassador, John Bolton, has said that he is prepared to vote against it. Is the Minister able to give us any insights in respect of why the United States is opposed, what compromises it might be looking for, and what prospect there is for the introduction of the human rights council? Can the Minister also assure us that the system of monitoring human rights worldwide under the UN special rapporteurs will continue and be properly resourced?

Much more could be said about central Asia and human rights. I am grateful to hon. Members of all parties for attending the debate. I hope that our words and concerns will be heard outwith this Chamber, and that there might be a little hope for the future of the oppressed people in these countries.

9.53 am

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this important debate. Like me, he has long had an interest in this part of the world, and I am sure that he would agree that, if anything, the debate is somewhat overdue.

Central Asia is a relatively neglected part of the world—neglected by policy makers, that mythical body called the international community, and, dare I say it, by Her Majesty's Government, and even by the House. There have, I think, been two oral questions on the region and, perhaps, two dozen written questions in the last year, from, for instance, the hon. Members for Orkney and Shetland, for Stroud (Mr. Drew), for Bassetlaw (John Mann), for Moray (Angus Robertson), and for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), and from my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow).

I have been to all five of the countries in question, and to Uzbekistan on various occasions. In a general sense, central Asia is not a happy part of the world, and its nations have certainly underperformed in the past 15 years, compared with other ex-Soviet republics not just in Europe but in Asia. Twenty years ago, Tashkent was more or less on a par with Novosibirsk or Krasnoyarsk. Since then, there has been quite a severe divergence in the wrong direction for Tashkent and other major central Asian cities.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland talked in detail about some of the economic statistics; those on per capita incomes and life expectancies are truly alarming. There are also some crazy economics in countries such as Uzbekistan. It is one of the few countries where people can still be seen doing their daily shopping with huge wads of cash. I have seen ethnic Russians showing up at travel agencies with large wheeled hold-alls full of cash to buy their one-way ticket to Moscow; it makes me think of the Weimar republic.

One issue that has not been touched on so far is the regrettable out-migration of ethnic Russians. That is partly due to Russia's loss of its previous status as the quasi-colonial power, but it is also due to human rights concerns. Depending on one's view on what is going on in Moscow, that journey might smack a little of being a case of out of the frying pan and into the fire. However, that phenomenon is sucking out a lot of the middle classes—such as they exist—from these countries.

Most of the interest that there is in the region in the outside world—and, indeed, in the House—is due to energy interests. I am not against there being such interests, but we need also to consider human rights, which in many of these countries are awful. Uzbekistan is without doubt one of the five most tyrannical regimes in the world at present. Turkmenistan exceeds even

[Mr. Greg Hands]

North Korea in its rampant Stalinist personality cult. Tajikistan is still in chaos. Kyrgyzstan still has an uncertain future, and the recent Kazakh election was, at best, questionable.

I want to focus briefly on Turkmenistan, before concentrating mainly on Uzbekistan. In describing Turkmenistan, it is a shame that we are not allowed visual aids, because it is difficult to get a feel for the country without having seen it. There is a massive personality cult; the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland referred to it. The leader is Niyazov, the self-styled Turkmenbashi, and his regime is characterised by vanity, control freakery and a habit of fantasy and invention. I have always written him up as TB for short. The phrase "Halk, Watan, Turkmenbashi" can be seen almost everywhere in the country; it means something like, "Praise the leader." All of us have come across occasional snippets about him. I share the view of the hon. Gentleman. In that country, one spends about a third of the time in a state of bizarre amusement, but for two thirds of the time one is appalled at what is going on. In the centre of Ashkabad, there is a neutrality monument. It is an 8 m-high gold statue of Turkmenbashi that revolves on top of a pedestal that is about 70 m high. The leader of the country greets the sun in the morning—the statue faces the sun—and then he revolves during the day and says goodbye to the setting sun in the evening. It is incredible to watch. However, the cruel reality in Turkmenistan is that open expression of alternative views is not possible. It can result in imprisonment or forced institutionalisation in a psychiatric hospital. There is no free media, and even most publications from Russia are banned, and steps are taken to suppress the use of the internet.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland rightly focused much of his speech on Uzbekistan. Human rights abuses in Uzbekistan are not new, but on 13 May last year in the city of Andijan there was the world's biggest peacetime massacre of demonstrators since Tiananmen square. I was delighted recently to meet Muhammed Salih, the last Uzbek opposition leader who dared to speak out. He has written an excellent book called "The Opponent". It starts by describing his unhappy time as a Soviet soldier during the occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1968. Mr Salih spoke movingly of the events in Andijan, and, in response to my questioning, he outlined how the opposition in the country was being much maligned by the Government, who seek to paint its members as Islamists and terrorists, both of which are gross distortions.

I commend the work of Human Rights Watch which, despite facing great difficulties and some danger to its own people, has managed to put together a credible account of what happened in Andijan—of tanks rolling through the main square and firing indiscriminately, of snipers picking off their victims, and of soldiers later shooting dead some of the wounded. At the time that they happened, the events of 13 May 2005 were somewhat buried under a glut of other international news. That was just after our election, and the French and the Dutch were in the middle of EU constitution ratification, so the attention of the international community may to some extent have been elsewhere.

Over the past nine months, I have tabled more than a dozen questions on the Government's response to the events at Andijan, and on what action the UK and the international community are taking. The first response to my very first question on the subject came not from the Minister for Europe, but from the Uzbek embassy in London; its response actually came before the Government's. The embassy sent me what I am sure it thought was a helpful e-mail, a six-page exposition of what it described as the "terrorist" incidents at Andijan, which it bizarrely blamed on Hizb ut-Tahrir. The e-mail had a sinister tone, demanding to know, for example, where I had learned aspects of idiomatic Uzbek, and so on.

The reaction internationally to the events at Andijan has been very weak, and for no particular reason; there is not even the excuse that Uzbek bases are needed to project coalition power in the region. Energy concerns are not particularly great in Uzbekistan. To the best of my knowledge, Uzbekistan is still a member of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and still has a partnership and co-operation agreement with the EU, although I could not ascertain whether that has been suspended. Germany seems quite happy to allow Uzbek Government leaders to receive medical treatment there, claiming that it is being done on humanitarian grounds. I question whether the population of Uzbekistan has the same access to quality medical treatment.

There is an EU arms embargo, although Uzbekistan is a member of the NATO partnership for peace programme. It must be the first time in history that we have a military ally on whom we have an arms embargo. I pointed that out to the Minister at Foreign Office questions in October, but it seems that no action has resulted. Thankfully, the US has been a little tougher than the EU; it has at least pulled out of its military base, although it is slightly unclear whether that was voluntary.

The Economist's excellent editorial of 25 August last year said, with reference to Andijan:

> "On few, if any, occasions since the cold war has so little been done by so many in the face of such atrocity."

The article goes on to criticise the EU for

> "a display of spinelessness worthy of a sea full of jellyfish."

In three months' time, I hope in co-operation with other speakers here, I will be hosting, in Parliament, an anniversary event for 13 May.

In conclusion, we need a much tougher response on Uzbekistan. It is still not too late. I again draw a contrast with the response to Tiananmen square in 1989. Ironically, at the time that response was criticised in many quarters for not being strong enough, but it was actually quite swift and—compared to the response to Andijan—quite strong. Some 17 years on, there are still some sanctions in place against China; yet here we are nine months after Andijan with very little to show.

In my time in the region, I often thought that Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and, to some extent, Kazakhstan were how eastern Europe countries would have been had the Berlin wall not fallen in 1989. One might recall Ceausescu and Honecker in 1989 praising the Chinese authorities after Tiananmen square, and thank God that they were never able to copy those authorities. The regimes that we are talking about, particularly that of Uzbekistan, have copied the Chinese example. Uzbekistan, in particular, and Turkmenistan are worse than the countries of cold war eastern Europe; they are more like the Stalinist days of the early 1950s. Torture is rampant, demonstrators are shot, there are no press freedoms, censorship is complete, and there are roadblocks everywhere on the highways. We need a far tougher response from the western world and from Her Majesty's Government, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's answers.

10.3 am

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands), who is obviously well informed about the situation on the ground in the republics that we are talking about. I commend the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate.

My interest in former Soviet republics is normally about the south Caucasus—Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia. It is through my interest in that region and my involvement in the non-governmental organisation sector that I have come to understand how much of human rights work is dependent on funding from the UK Government through the global conflict prevention pool. The last GCPP report, "A joint UK Government approach to reducing conflict", states:

"Activities under the various strategies include ... .Helping civil society organisations defuse the tensions which can lead to violent conflict. This can include some promotion of human rights."

One NGO involved in the former Soviet republics has outlined its work as consisting of: fostering institutional and legal reform by providing international comparative expertise; engaging in advocacy on a national and international level; the training of key actors—that is, young journalists, lawyers, judges, specialised NGOs and public officials; the monitoring and auditing of the public's access to official information; and raising public awareness about the practical function of freedom of expression and access to information in a democracy. Those are exactly the sort of efforts that are essential to deal with the shortcomings that have been outlined.

It may not be well known to some Members present that the Government have slashed their spending on these important efforts by 20 per cent. as a whole. It may surprise them even more to hear that funding to the former Soviet republics has been almost halved; there is a cut of nearly 50 per cent.

In a Westminster Hall debate last October, to which the Minister responded, I read out a reply that I had received from an NGO, which said that the cuts "will have negative implications for the democratic transformations in the region. Work cannot be carried out with gaps in time; there should be continuity and an ongoing flow of activities that build on past strengths and existing experiences".

Another NGO said that it would have to "tap core support and cut back in projects", and said that there are

"obviously other pressures on government spending, but nothing has been made clear as to why the money has gone".

Having worked with many NGOs in the south Caucasus, I am passionate about the subject, and I do not think that the cut in spending there is justified. It would seem extraordinary if the UK Government were to cut spending to the central Asian republics.

My first specific question to the Minister, together with his colleagues from the Department, is to ask him to run through the cut in spending to Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. Will he confirm that there has been a cut in spending through the conflict prevention pools to projects in those republics? Nothing that we have heard today would give anyone confidence to suggest that either the human rights situation or the democratic situation have improved over the past year; if anything, they have become worse.

The Minister and I have a difference of view on the Iraq conflict, but there is an appreciation that funds, including other budget lines from the conflict prevention pools, have gone from central Asia to Iraq. If the Government have cut funding, now is the time for them to explain why, and to say which projects in the central Asian republics will be affected.

My second point is about the UK Government and the domestic reaction to the human rights situation in central Asia. Not many citizens of the republics that we are talking about live in the UK. I happen to have a Turkmen citizen—an ethnic Russian—in my constituency. He is going through some of the difficulties that the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham outlined. I have raised his case with the Home Office, and I do not expect the Minister to talk specifically about it, but I would like to give him the correspondence on the subject. In that way, he can liaise with the Home Office so that the matter can be dealt with.

It may not be clear to people outside the region that the Turkmen laws regarding marriage were such that until the beginning of the year $50,000 had to be paid as a fee for registering a marriage with a foreigner. That is extraordinary. I suspect that that was part of the effort to try to stop the ethnic Russian middle classes leaving. Be that as it may, international pressure was put on the Turkmen authorities and changes to the law have been brought about, but it would be a fantasy to think that the problems have disappeared because of that.

My constituent has appealed against a decision to refuse a certificate of approval for the marriage in the UK. She was granted a visa extension to enable her to have her child in the UK, which has happened, and she has been allowed to remain in the UK for several more months, after which her current visa status requires her to return to Turkmenistan before she can apply for a marriage visa. How extraordinary that somebody who is here in safety and has had a child is having to return to that country. We do not have enough time to read the reports from Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe and the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, etc., all of which are saying that this is an issue of concern.

For prescience I shall read one paragraph from a document from the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights, published at the beginning of January. It states:

"the Turkmen authorities had to cancel this repressive law"—

the registration law—

"yet they were reluctant to offer complete freedom to their citizens, so lists of those who were not allowed to leave Turkmenistan, i.e. 'black lists' appeared in the country. According to various data these lists included between 3 to 5 thousand names. However, most of these people only learnt about their status when they were at the airport about to board a plane. When such cases became known to diplomats at foreign embassies, the Turkmen Foreign Ministry had to demonstrate great ingenuity in order to justify the actions of the border officers and special services.

Consequently, a new law was passed which requires all those wishing to exit Turkmenistan irrespective of the aim of the trip to obtain a new document—a passport for the citizens of Turkmenistan for going abroad and entering Turkmenistan—in advance of the trip."

That is not satisfactory. It would be helpful if in time, if not today, the Foreign Office clarified that position. There cannot be hundreds and thousands of Turkmen citizens in the UK; it must be a small group of people. The case has been made by verifiably independent human rights organisations that the current situation is not acceptable. I hope that the Home Office and the Foreign Office will co-ordinate to ensure that people seeking to remain in the UK are treated according to their circumstances and that they are deeply sceptical about the human rights situation in Turkmenistan.

The Government have some work to do on this matter and they have some explanations to give on the funding of projects in various central Asian republics. I am sure that the Minister will say that the UK Government have grave concerns and are doing everything that they can. However, if that is so, are they cutting their funding and, if so, why?

10.13 am

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this important debate. The last time that I listened to a speech in the House by my hon. Friend, the outcome was a defeat for the Government by one vote. The Government will be pleased that there will not be a vote on this debate. None the less, I hope that the issues raised are treated with the degree of concern that they warrant.

I congratulate also the two speakers who preceded me—the hon. Members for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) and for Moray (Angus Robertson)—particularly the former for making a well-informed and insightful speech based on his experience of visiting all those countries in the region.

I have a degree of sympathy for the Government on such occasions, because it is normal in these debates for everybody to agree that the state of affairs in the given country is deplorable and ask the Government what they are going to do about it. The Government have scope to make headway and progress, otherwise we would have nothing to discuss, but we should not delude ourselves that the Foreign Office or wider Government are able to resolve all the ills of the world from Whitehall. None the less, this is an important debate and I hope that the Foreign Office will not try to be so realpolitik with this region that it will see wider strategic concerns taking too great a precedence over the worrying human rights abuses that have already been chronicled during this debate.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland on his vigilant opposition to the use of the death penalty around the world, which is a form of sanction that debases humanity. It is a laudable aim for all hon. Members—I am pleased that there is now a large degree of consensus across parties in Britain—to say that the death penalty is an inappropriate way to punish people and to send a wider signal to populations of other countries, which is often another of its effects.

We in this country so often take for granted a range of freedoms, including freedom of election, media freedom, freedom of trade union affiliation and religious practice, which has already been touched on, freedom of association and the rule of law and a proper independent criminal justice system. I join those who have already spoken in urging the Minister and the Government not to neglect or too readily forget the events in Andijan only 10 months or so ago. Tiananmen square took place when I was a 19-year-old and a few years have passed since then, but it lingers long in the memory and rightly so, because such events are more likely to be repeated if they are too readily forgotten.

I have four suggestions that are not directly within the remit of the Government but are, none the less, areas where they may have some scope to act. First, this region has a low profile in this country and in western Europe, north America and other parts of the world, and it is easy to neglect it. Few people in this country have ever been there and many of them probably could not locate it accurately on a world map. Few people from the region have visited our country. There is little scope for cultural interchange. As a consequence, countries that are out of sight are often out of mind as well. It would help provoke debate in this country, and raise greater concerns than have already been made apparent by groups such as Amnesty International, if people in Britain had a greater appreciation of the way of life and culture and difficulties faced by people in the region. I do not claim that that is directly in the frame of reference of the Minister, but it is worth bearing it in mind that when opportunities arise to promote understanding of that region, whether through the media or in the House, that is an important factor in bringing international pressure to bear on those who abuse their power in these countries.

Secondly, I should like to talk about poverty, which the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland mentioned, including widespread hunger, unemployment and reduced life expectancy. Extreme poverty can be a powerful instrument of control for a regime that wishes to use it in that way—Zimbabwe is as graphic an illustration of that as any country. Such poverty also brutalises a society and means that the human rights concerns of the people who live there are relegated, day to day, below the more immediate concerns of keeping body and soul together. It is always difficult to try to maintain a civilised civic society when people live in extreme poverty and feel that they are willing to complain less about their circumstances, in terms of their liberties, as long as they are able to feed and shelter themselves and their families.

As the hon. Member for Moray said, the Government have scope to make progress on that issue and to try to encourage the Governments in the countries that we are discussing—in so far as we have relations with them—to do the same.

My third suggestion is to do with the issue raised about natural resources and energy in the countries of central Asia. Too often, we in the west regard the need to provide for our energy requirements and drive up our standard of living as taking precedence over all forms of foreign relations. I do not wish to be unrealistic; like my constituents, I drive a car and heat a home, and we should guard against being unduly hypocritical. None the less, rather than seeing the need to increase our energy supply as a reason for overlooking human rights, we should regard it more as a lever for change and a way of exercising pressure elsewhere. The Government need to be forceful in that regard.

My final thought is not directly a matter of Government policy, but it is about an issue that they may seek to influence. I do not believe that human rights ever quite come about by Governments signing treaties or forcing them to emerge artificially. The process is more subtle and difficult than that; it is about engendering in people, and those to whom they give their consent to rule, a sense of values that they regard as impossible to violate.

That is more delicate than something that a Foreign Secretary decrees should happen by signing a piece of paper, and it is a worldwide process. I do not regard human rights and civil liberties as the particular preserve of those who happen to be fortunate enough to live in a country in which Government Ministers treat such issues with due concern. That is why I particularly commend the work of Amnesty International, an organisation of which I am a member, and others. They see the issue in a global context, remind us to be vigilant and foster the desire in people throughout the world to live free from tyranny and terror.

I leave those thoughts with the Minister and look forward to hearing his speech and that of the official Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown). I hope that the Minister will be able to answer many of the concerns raised this morning.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am grateful for having caught your eye in this debate, Mr. Cook. I apologise to the Chamber as I have just developed a nose bleed. I am sorry if I look unsavoury; that is the reason why.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate. As he says, not enough attention is paid to central Asia. Some appalling human rights abuses are going on in that part of the world, although as I said during my intervention on the hon. Gentleman, it is wrong to brand all five "stans" in the same way. They have very different populations. Some have greater Russian populations—for example, 30 per cent. of Kazakhstan's population is Russian, but only 3.5 per cent. of Tajikistan's is Russian. The countries are very different in make-up, they have different languages, different religious beliefs and consequently different Governments. They have varying human rights records. For the sake of completeness, I shall talk about all five countries. I shall end with Uzbekistan and the problems there following the massacre.

Tajikistan has perhaps the best human rights and democratic record of the lot. It has independent television, allows independent trade unions and permits public assembly, albeit with a licence, and those are all characteristics of the democratic, open state that we would like to see.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) and I saw the Kazakh Foreign Minister yesterday. Although there are concerns about President Nazarbayev's recent re-election, Kazakhstan wants to do business with the west. The Foreign Minister made it absolutely clear that he was here to promote his country and that it wants to move towards democracy and better human rights.

We learned one very interesting fact from the Foreign Minister: within four years, Kazakhstan will become the world's largest exporter of uranium. Recently, it signed a memorandum of understanding with the Russians. This is well outside the scope of this debate, but if we could persuade the Iranians to have a system under which the Russians processed their uranium, that uranium would come from Kazakhstan. That is an interesting possibility. Kazakhstan has rich oil and gas reserves.

Turkmenistan has already been referred to. It is effectively a one-party state; the Democratic party of Turkmenistan is the only registered political party and faces no serious opposition. [Interruption.] Shades of the situation in this country? Perhaps not—the Opposition here are getting stronger, and we do not want a one-party state.

Perhaps more worryingly, Kyrgyzstan faces a possible break-up as a country. An article by the Institute for War and Peace Reporting states:

"Kyrgyzstan has been in constant turmoil in recent months, with protests, confrontations and scandals following one another in close succession."

The article goes on to say:

"When it comes to the basic tasks of government—law and order, resource management, and reform—the authorities are failing badly, and they are also losing out to their critics in the battle for public opinion.

Given all these circumstances, one hears more and more often the view that the country is swiftly moving towards a tragic finale where it becomes patently apparent that Kyrgyzstan has not developed into a fully-fledged nation, and peace-keeping forces are brought in from the outside."

The article states that the greatest pessimists predict that Kyrgyzstan could break into two.

That leads me to Uzbekistan, the last of the five "stans". It will be useful to cite a letter written by the organisation Human Rights Watch that restates the UN's fundamental declaration on human rights, the core principle on which the UN was founded and to which all nations on Earth should adhere. The letter states:

"The United Nations Declaration on the Right and Responsibility of Individuals, Groups and Organs of Society to Promote and Protect Universally Recognized Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms sets forth the standards by which the international community assesses states' treatment of rights defenders ... Article 1 of the declaration states clearly that, 'Everyone has the right, individually and in association with others, to promote and to strive for the protection and realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms at the national and international levels.' Article 2 stipulates that each state has a responsibility and duty to create all conditions necessary to ensure that all persons under its jurisdiction, individually and in association with others, are able to enjoy all human rights and fundamental freedoms in practice."

As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland said, we often take what we have in this democratic country of ours, and in the west, for granted. It is too easy to forget how possible it is to go about one's daily life in an atmosphere of peace and freedom.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

So what happened in Uzbekistan? There have been various descriptions, but the best I have read comes from Human Rights Watch. I shall quote it to show how bad what happened in Uzbekistan on 13 May last year was. The description is very telling:

"In the early morning hours of May 13, gunmen attacked government buildings, killed security officials, broke into the city prison, took over the local government building ... and took hostages. Towards dawn, they began to prepare for a large protest in Bobur Square, in front of the hokimiat, and mobilized people to attend. By 11.00 a.m., as word spread, the protest grew into the thousands, as people came of their own will and vented their grievances about poverty and government repression. When government forces sealed off the square and started shooting indiscriminately, the protesters fled. Hundreds of them were ambushed by government forces, which gunned them down without warning. This stunning use of excessive force has been documented by the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations."

Yet we have heard relatively little about that slaughter in Andijan in this Parliament or in the world's media. My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) quoted an article from The Economist. During his excellent, fluent speech, which reflected his knowledge of the area, my hon. Friend told us that Uzbekistan is a member of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and has a partnership and co-operation agreement with the European Union, so there is some justification in allowing Europe, with its famous common security policy, to take the lead. He also quoted from an article in The Economist, which continues with a wonderful bit of irony:

"If so, the European Union has risen to the occasion as grandly as it did over Bosnia, Iraq and on so many other occasions: with a display of spinelessness worthy of a sea full of jellyfish."

Like the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, my hon. Friend has tabled questions about the visit to Germany of the Uzbek Foreign Minister—there is no reason why he should not be held to account for his country's activities.

I can give many examples from reports on the matters that concern me—torture; secret trials; people who do not have access to proper lawyers; people who are given long sentences without justification; and, perhaps worst of all, the case of Mutabar Tojibaeva. An article from Human Rights Watch dated 7 March quotes Holly Cartner, its Europe and Central Asia director, who says:

"The trial that led to the sentence of Tojibaeva is so unsound that her conviction cannot be allowed to stand ... We view Tojibaeva's conviction as part of a pattern of persecution against independent voices and critics within civil society since the Andijan massacre. The ferocity of this pattern is unprecedented even when judged against Uzbekistan's 14-year history of repression since independence from the Soviet Union."

Uzbekistan is a real pariah state, and the world should focus on it.

In closing, I have a few questions for the Minister. No doubt he will run through all the "stans". Perhaps he will say a little about what Government representation we have in each. As the Government are in embassy-closing mode, can he reassure us that, in view of the problems in these countries, none of our embassies or consulates there will close. Yesterday we were told by the Foreign Secretary that we recently opened a second consulate in Kazakhstan. That is a good sign; we want to see British representation maintained at the highest level in these countries.

There have been alarming reports from Ukraine and other countries that are sending refugees back to Uzbekistan. One can only imagine the fate of such people. In particular, I refer to a report from the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, on Ukraine's decision to return Uzbek asylum seekers. It says that Mr De Gucht, the OSCE's current Chairman-in-Office, has expressed his consternation at the decision taken by the Ukraine authorities to extradite 11 Uzbek asylum seekers back to Uzbekistan. What representations are the British Government making to Governments who propose to send refugees back to Ukbekistan? They are in grave danger of being persecuted, if not executed, if sent back.

Mr. Carmichael: I am mindful of the hon. Gentleman's earlier comments about the dangers of applying common standards across the five "stans", which were perfectly legitimate. In this context, does he share my concern that there have been instances of the four other "stans" sending back to Uzbekistan people who have subsequently been the subject of unfair trials and have been sentenced to death? It is all very well to say that there are good human rights practices within some of the countries, but they should not be allowed to be blind to the poor practices of their neighbour, Uzbekistan.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. There is no recognition in each of the countries—at least in public; there might be in private—of the conditions in the others. Again, the British Government could make some useful representations to each country about the conditions in the others, and the fact that we expect to see articles 1 and 2 of the United Nations conventions upheld by every single country. A fundamental aspect of those articles is that refugees should not be returned to countries where they are likely to be persecuted or, worse, executed. One of the worst consequences of refugees going back to Uzbekistan is that a number of them have simply disappeared. Their families do not know where they are or what has happened to them; that is reminiscent of some of the dark days of the Peron regime, and it is very unsatisfactory.

In conclusion, this is an interesting but potentially unstable region. The western world can do it a great deal of good through unilateral, bilateral and multilateral contact with its countries as they emerge from the shadows of the Soviet Union. We have been engaged in the democratic process for 400 or 500 years; they have not. They are learning all the time, and they can learn a great deal from the west, particularly from the United Kingdom Government who have a worldwide perspective on freedom and proper recognition of human rights. I hope that we will hear from the Minister that the British Government are doing a great deal in that respect.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on having secured the debate. Its merit was already proven before I rose to my feet, and I hope that I shall strengthen hon. Members' convictions that the debate is worth while by the remarks that I am able to offer.

I welcome the opportunity to underline our commitment to improving human rights in central Asia. I also pay tribute—I would be remiss to do anything else—to the longstanding interest in these matters, in particular the abolition of the death penalty, of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, and acknowledge the important work undertaken by non-governmental organisations such as those, including Amnesty International, that he generously recognised at the beginning of his speech. I shall ensure that the terms of this debate are shared with my ministerial colleagues in the Department for International Development, as he requested in the course of his remarks.

It is already clear, on the basis of our discussion this morning, that the House is united in its profound concern about the continuing negative trend on human rights in central Asia. Let me assure hon. Members that the Government continue to place a high priority on trying to bring about improvements. We remain committed to encouraging, cajoling and, where possible, co-operating with the countries in the region, to help to bring about greater freedoms and the development of civil society. We also remain focused on the difficult question, which has been honestly recognised, of how, in practice, the United Kingdom, acting in concert with the European Union and other international partners, can best effect positive change, not least in countries with a record of repression.

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), urged me to set out the level of representation at our posts in central Asia. Essentially, we have embassies in all except Kyrgyztan; I shall write to him for the sake of completeness. On the matter of the Uzbek refugees, we have made representations to the Kyrgys, Kazakhs, Russian and Ukrainian authorities to allow the United Nations high commissioner for refugees to fulfil its procedures before decisions are taken on extradition. The Government have urged the relevant authorities to continue to abide by their commitments to the United Nations conventions on refugees and against torture, and the Uzbek authorities to treat any returned refugees according to their international commitments. I raised the issue directly with the Kyrgys Foreign Minister when I met him last month.

Mr. Carmichael: The Minister has referred to the importance of co-operating with the different agencies that work in the region as well as with the Governments. Normally, the benefit of debates such as this is that they allow us to put matters on record. Can I say to the Minister that I have deliberately not placed on record today a number of significant matters of concern to NGOs because I am concerned, as are others, about affecting the work of the NGOs in those areas. Would the Minister undertake to join me as part of a cross-party delegation to meet NGOs such as Amnesty International, Christian Aid and others involved in the region to hear from them about their concerns and to consider how Government and NGO might work effectively together in the area?

Mr. Alexander: I am, of course, sensitive to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman and to the sensitivities of the important, brave work that some of the NGOs undertake. I would be happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and those who represent the NGOs to address these questions. Given my background with these organisations, it would be bizarre if I were unwilling to meet them. I am happy to give that undertaking.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland has raised an extremely important point, which I also meant to raise. Would the Minister wholeheartedly condemn the Governments, such as those of Russia and Uzbekistan, who make it extremely difficult for NGOs? Russia wants to ban NGOs, and Uzbekistan is thinking about following those lines. Would he wholeheartedly condemn any Government who seek to ban the work of NGOs in their country?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman raises a timely issue. I was in Moscow only last week, and at my request I met a cross-section of the NGOs, particularly those dealing with human rights in Russia, and heard directly from some genuinely inspiring individuals the difficulties and concerns that they fear in the light of the passage of the NGO law through the state Duma. It is a matter of record that through our embassy in Moscow we have raised such concerns directly with the Russian Government and members of the Duma.

Given my conversations with the NGOs, our responsibility is to follow closely the implementation of the NGO law. It has been moderated from the original proposals. None the less, I am clear that we will focus considerably on the human rights record and the treatment of NGOs in Russia not only in the immediate weeks and months ahead in anticipation of the G8 meeting in St. Petersburg in July, but after July as well. One of the points put to me by the NGOs was that they were aware that there would be a great deal of international scrutiny in the immediate months ahead, but that their concern was to ensure that that scrutiny would continue once the international focus moved away from the Russian Government's efforts for the G8.

Mr. Hands: On the subject of the Minister's constructive-sounding talks with Russia, what specific representations has he made about the situation in Uzbekistan? My experience to date has been that the Russians appear wholeheartedly to back the official Uzbek line. What specific things has he been pressing Russia, as a country with great influence in the regions, to do?

Mr. Alexander: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we have bilateral conversations with the Russians about the central Asian republics and Uzbekistan as part of that area. My discussions in Moscow focused principally and directly on the situation with human rights and NGOs in Russia, given the bilateral focus of that visit. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will continue to address the other issues, including engagement with the central Asian republics, with Russian interlocutors on a regular basis.

I want also to address one or two specific points raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, before I move on to some of the specific countries that have understandably featured prominently in our debate. The hon. Gentleman has long campaigned on the death penalty, and I am pleased to note that Turkmenistan has abolished the death penalty, while Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan have introduced moratoriums. However, it is regrettable that the Uzbek authorities have not introduced a moratorium pending the planned abolition of the death penalty in 2008. No death penalties appear to have been passed since the decision to abolish them was taken last August, according to the information that I have seen. I would strongly urge all central Asian countries to abolish the death penalty as soon as possible.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the human rights council of the United Nations, and in particularly the approach of the United States towards the evolution of that organisation in light of the comments made by John Bolton, the US representative to the United Nations. It is with some relief that I address the Chamber as a representative of the British Government, rather than on behalf of any other sovereign Government. I want to make a substantive point, which bears on our earlier discussion on how we can exercise influence rather than—with the greatest respect to the earnest and sincere speeches made today—simply make speeches about the difficult challenges we face in advancing the global agenda on human rights.

I was privileged to travel to the United Nations General Assembly in New York last year, in our capacity as president of the European Union, for a number of third country meetings. I took the opportunity to meet the United Kingdom's permanent representative, a distinguished and able diplomat, and discuss the progress that had been made in anticipation of the millennium review summit, which had taken place the previous week and where the issues of institutional reform in the UN were discussed. I left with a clear sense of how central the role of the United Kingdom had been in securing the albeit limited progress on UN reform based on the report by the high-level panel and the Secretary-General.

It was clear to me in the course of my conversations with the permanent representative that but for the language that had been secured in the Gleneagles communiqué the previous July, with a number of commitments from a range of countries that included the United States, it would have been a more difficult endeavour to secure the changes that we were looking for and from some of the amendments that had originally been proposed by other partners, including the United States. That is a practical example of where, far away from the scrutiny of the media and from newspaper headlines, important and vital work is being taken forward by British diplomats in pursuit of the goals that all Members would share, I am sure.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The Minister's remarks call for a comment. He may be aware that I was part of the all-party delegation that recently went to the UN. We met Emyr Jones Parry, our permanent representative, for whom we all had the highest regard. Many reforms are going on in the UN at the moment, of which the human rights council is only one. Will the Minister assure us that that reform will be one of the highest priorities for the British Government when pressing the UN for reform?

Mr. Alexander: I can certainly assure the hon. Gentleman that we continue to work on the issue. The emphasis that Emyr Jones Parry was able to stress when I met him last year was part of a continuity of approach, which unlike the focus and scrutiny secured by the millennium review summit is a matter of continuing work for the United Kingdom's mission in the United Nations.

I will write to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland on the issues that he has raised about torture and its use in intelligence. However, I want to place a clear statement on the record, as he suggested. The United Kingdom unreservedly condemns the use of torture and has worked hard with international partners to eradicate the practice. The British Government, including the intelligence and security agencies, never use torture for any purpose, including obtaining information, and nor would we instigate others to do so. I would be happy to set out a fuller response to the hon. Gentleman's direct question, so that it is a matter of public record.

Mr. Carmichael: When the Minister sets out the Government's position, which I look forward to receiving, will he take care to outline their position not only on his unambiguous statement today but on the attention that is given to the provenance of intelligence from other countries? To use a hypothetical example, if the United States obtained information from Uzbekistan, which was passed on to us, would the roots of that intelligence be available to the UK Government and would they bear that in mind in its use?

Mr. Alexander: That has understandably been a matter of concern, and I will be happy to set out the British Government's position when I write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the treatment of religious minorities, in particular those of the Christian faith in central Asia. It is right to acknowledge that Christians are discriminated against across the region, as are other religions. Just this week, the last synagogue in Tajikistan was pulled down. Our embassies throughout the region meet frequently with members of all faiths and lobby their host Governments, both in individual cases and more generally on the importance of freedom of religion. I assure the hon. Gentleman that that will be a continued focus of our work in the months and years ahead.

Uzbekistan featured prominently in several contributions to the debate. The Foreign Affairs Committee has this year recognised that human rights are at the forefront of our relationship with Uzbekistan. That is a welcome reflection of the work of our ambassador David Moran and his team in Tashkent, who have been pursuing our agenda with the Uzbeks in increasingly difficult circumstances.

Ten months ago, as the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) described in his wide-ranging speech, the world learned of a place called Andijan in Uzbekistan, for all the wrong reasons. We have recognised the criminal nature of armed attacks on the prison, which acted as the catalyst for the ensuing events. But that element of criminality cannot begin to excuse the excessive, disproportionate and indiscriminate use of force by the Uzbek security forces in Andijan.

Mr. Hands: I appreciate the Minister's continued condemnation in this context and the answers that have been given to various written parliamentary questions, but will he explain why Uzbekistan, for example, is still a member of the NATO partnership for peace? He has answered me on that point that it is up to Britain and our NATO allies; but has Britain put it to our NATO allies that it is unacceptable for Uzbekistan to be part of an organisation called a partnership for peace?

Mr. Alexander: Let me address the hon. Gentleman's specific point in the course of my remarks about what steps the European Union is taking; I shall indeed also answer his point about NATO.

As all Members of the House are aware, the Uzbek authorities have consistently rejected calls for an independent inquiry into the tragic events that we have discussed this morning, despite claiming to be committed to the standards of both the United Nations and the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe. Instead, since May last year we have witnessed a programme of detention and harassment of those, including human rights defenders, journalists and others, who have questioned the authorities' version of events in Andijan on the days in question. Embassies have not been immune from the Government's drive to prevent those with concerns about human rights in Uzbekistan from expressing them.

As to the specific matter of what action has been taken, I shall speak first about the European Union and then deal with the question of NATO. On 3 October 2005, under the United Kingdom's presidency, the European Union Foreign Ministers, at the General Affairs and External Relations Council, decided to implement first an arms embargo and secondly visa restrictions on those deemed responsible for the disproportionate use of force at Andijan.

During the debate I was asked why the Uzbek interior Minister was able to secure medical treatment in Germany. My understanding is that Almatov's visa was issued before the visa ban came into force. Germany checked that the medical case for the visa was urgent before deciding to issue it. However, I understand that the visa ban is now fully in force.

The third aspect of work that progressed at the General Affairs Council of 3 October concerned a suspension of all technical meetings under the partnership and co-operation agreement with Uzbekistan. The co-operation council that was due to take place in February has been postponed indefinitely. A fourth decision was the reorientation of the Commission's funding programme in Uzbekistan, which was worth €9.2 million in 2005–06, to support an increased focus on poverty reduction and the promotion of democracy, human rights and civil society.

The NATO Secretary-General has also supported the call of the United Nations for an independent inquiry, to which I have already referred. The United Kingdom believes that NATO co-operation with Uzbekistan should focus on those areas that will promote adherence to our shared values: specifically, democratic control of the armed forces and respect for human rights. NATO is currently reviewing training programmes case by case, on the basis that I have just set out—to consider whether the areas in question will promote adherence to the shared values that I mentioned.

Angus Robertson: What is the reason for the apparent inconsistency in the European Union and NATO approaches? If it is right for the EU to suspend meetings, why should not the United Kingdom Government within NATO pursue a suspension of Uzbekistan's membership of partnership for peace?

Mr. Alexander: There is no categoric answer that can always be offered to the challenge of dealing with repressive regimes with bad human rights records. I would not pretend before the House that policy-making is that straightforward. Instead, it is necessary to consider both what influence can be exerted and what instruments are available for exercising that influence. The question how best to secure such influence is a reasonable one. It is a matter that we keep under review, in relation to the international organisations of which we are a part—such as the European Union and NATO—but it is simply a fact that the EU is a distinct international organisation from NATO.

The views that we express within those organisations do not necessarily differ in accordance with the responses that are then agreed within them. It is a logical fallacy to suggest that differing approaches taken by NATO and the EU show a disparity in the views that were expressed by the British Government. We take to both those forums a view about how best to advance the interests of human rights. That is the basis on which we conduct our discussions with international partners, and an agreement is then reached.

I am glad to say that our concerns are shared throughout the European Union and the wider international community. Seventy-three countries supported the United Nations resolution that called for an independent inquiry into events in Andijan and for the Uzbek authorities to deal with numerous other areas of concern, including freedom of expression and freedom of religion. A stable, prosperous and democratic Uzbekistan would have an important role to play in the development of central Asia. We continue to be interested in a meaningful dialogue with the Uzbeks, both bilaterally and within the EU, on co-operation on broader political and economic reforms. However, that will be possible only against a backdrop of progress on human rights, democratic reform and the development of civil society. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. The Minister is responding to the debate and has the Floor. Hon. Members will please observe parliamentary protocol.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Cook. I assure hon. Members that the issue of Andijan and human rights in Uzbekistan remains a focus of our work. Genuine, positive progress must be made. The EU has kept channels for dialogue open, including through its special representative for central Asia, Jan Kubis. I discussed with him only yesterday his plans to engage with the Uzbek Government at the highest levels to encourage them to act. We agreed, as do all our European Union partners, that it is the clear responsibility of the Uzbek authorities to address the concerns of the EU and the international community at large, by allowing an element of external scrutiny of Andijan and by demonstrating a genuine willingness to reform.

[Mr. Alexander]

Angus Robertson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Alexander: With the greatest of respect, I have been very generous in giving way and I am conscious of the time. I think that it would be inappropriate, given the range of countries that have been covered in the debate, if I responded solely on the issue of Uzbekistan, significant and important though it is.

I have dwelt, necessarily, on Uzbekistan, and the restrictive measures introduced in the wake of the terrible events in Andijan, but the overall human rights situation in Turkmenistan remains arguably worse. In the past three years the EU has co-sponsored three resolutions on Turkmenistan before the UN General Assembly and two before the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.

There are a few precious positives to recognise. The death penalty has been abolished in Turkmenistan, legislation was passed last year banning the use of child labour, and an increased number of religious minorities have now been registered. However, as a report by the UN Secretary-General noted last September, there is a lack of overall improvement in addressing serious human rights violations.

Our embassy in Ashgabat does invaluable work both raising individual cases and lobbying over broader human rights concerns with the Turkmen authorities. It runs projects aimed at opening Turkmenistan to the outside world, including internet projects and scholarships. It also supports the embryonic civil society, for example through resource centres and capacity training. The EU and OSCE also continue to engage with the Turkmen authorities to bring about improvements on basic human rights and freedoms.

On the specific consular case that the hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) put to me, I shall of course be content to pass on the correspondence directly to my colleagues in the Home Office, given the points that he raised about his constituents. More generally, when dealing with an essentially isolationist regime such as that of Turkmenistan, engagement—where necessary critical engagement—is exceedingly important. However, in calibrating that we should always be careful to avoid taking action that might rebound on the people that it is meant to help.

Our policy is to ensure that the Turkmen Government are in no doubt about our position and to maximise the leverage that we have by acting closely with the wider international community. Bringing about even small, incremental change in a largely closed country such as Turkmenistan is not easy, but the Turkmen Government take heed, for example, of the United Nations. We shall continue to make constructive use of all the levers at our disposal to encourage positive reform in Turkmenistan.

Later this year, the Tajiks will go to the polls to elect their president. That is a country that even in its own short history of independence since 1991 has experienced at first hand the dire consequences of a protracted and bloody civil war.

Greener Fuels (Taxation)

11 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Cook. It is also a pleasure to see the Minister, because he can sustain an intelligent and thoughtful dialogue on any subject and particularly one such as this. The debate gives a pre-Budget airing to what is, to some extent, a perennial topic in the House. I shall talk largely about the transport element of biofuel and not allow myself to venture onto other aspects of green fuel.

The fiscal system for biofuel and for greener fuel in general poses the Treasury with a dilemma. The Treasury's traditional role is to raise money in an acceptable and efficient way—that is the old rule by which the Treasury has abided for century after century. In recent times, however, the Treasury has had a new mission and has imposed taxes to change, penalise and encourage certain behaviour. As a result, we have the concept of environmental taxation, and therein lies the dilemma. If the Treasury succeeds manifestly in changing behaviour, it almost simultaneously succeeds in reducing the revenue that it would normally receive. I sometimes think that it should, in its own interests, allow us to pursue our own path to perdition, by letting us carry on smoking, drinking, gambling and polluting, thus providing itself with a stable income base, or that it should adopt the philosophy of sad resignation.

In recent times, however, the Treasury has had a much wider policy objective. The Minister's predecessor, the right hon. Paul Boateng, emphatically set out the Treasury's commitment to reduce greenhouse emissions and achieve other desirable environmental effects through taxation. None the less, one might suspect that some in the Treasury harbour residual doubts about the sanity of that procedure. There must, therefore, always be doubts about the sincerity of the Treasury's efforts.

We must none the less confront the fact that there are differential tax rates on bioethanol, biodiesel, liquid petroleum gas and ultra-low sulphur fuels. However, the effect of that tax regime is not exactly magnificent. Since 2000–05, the number of LPG vehicles has increased by a factor of five. That is not a massive increase, because the number of vehicles has increased only from 20,000 to 120,000. The number of outlets where one can obtain LPG has increased from 130 to about 490. The tax take has gone up to about £10 million, although that pales into insignificance compared with the £12 billion obtained from petrol. For LPG, therefore, the results are relatively modest.

Nor has there been massive success with bioethanol and biofuels in general, which are covered by the renewable fuels obligation. In a recent debate, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), stated quite categorically that they represent about 0.3 per cent. of the fuel used.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the construction of the country's first bioethanol plant by British Sugar at Wissington in my constituency is a good thing? Does he also agree that the development of the biofuels industry in this country is long overdue?

Dr. Pugh: Yes, that is a very timely intervention, as I was about to say that we have no facility, but we shall shortly have one, and that will be entirely desirable. We are bound to import some bioethanol, but doing so does a degree of environmental damage because it is shipped from places such as Brazil.

At the European level, biodiesel makes up about 0.2 per cent. of fuel sales. In England, there is one biodiesel plant, Argent Energy in Glasgow, which says that there is enough capacity for it to have other facilities and to develop fat further.

A previous Westminster Hall debate, which involved my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), established that the Department for Transport is engaged in fairly intensive discussions on how further to incentivise biofuels and what to incentivise. However, it is not unfair to observe that progress has not been good enough, and everybody would acknowledge that. That is not entirely the Treasury's fault, because other variables are at play. Those include the technology, the availability of resources and incorrigible factors such as consumer preferences, which are not as easily changed by a fiscal system as we might imagine.

However, there is clearly significant scope for further development. At the moment, we have a £3 billion wheat surplus, and wheat is eminently convertible into biofuels. We also have the potential to convert sugar into biofuels. On biodiesel, I mentioned Argent Energy in Glasgow, which reckons that it would need six other facilities similar to its present one simply to meet the renewable fuel obligation. We had a golden opportunity to make significant progress by reusing quantities of waste products such as tallow, used oil and food industry by-products. We also have significant hopes and aspirations that Government bodies will increasingly procure more environmentally friendly vehicles than they have hitherto.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way on that point about procurement policy in general. Does he agree that there is perhaps a leadership role for local authorities and local government in that regard? Many councils, including Stockport metropolitan borough council in my area, have moved their fleets of vehicles specially into LPG and other more socially useful fuels.

Dr. Pugh: My hon. Friend emphasises a point that I wanted to make. Exemplary efforts have been made by local government, occasionally by big firms and even by central Government. In the previous Westminster Hall debate on this issue, which was led by my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Halton, pointed to a number of cases of Government bodies converting their fleet to LPG or biofuel. That clearly indicates that there is considerable potential, although that potential is, by and large, unrealised.

The key question is how we can improve things, given that we all want to do so. We have to differentiate a little between LPG and biofuels. As I understand it, LPG has a 20 per cent. advantage over biofuels. As the maths and the finances stack up, there is every chance that somebody who converts a standard two to three-year-old vehicle to LPG will recover their costs within about two to three years. It would be a blissful day if most of the vehicles that passed us on the roads were LPG powered.

However, there are clearly availability issues as regards supply and technology, and there are also technical issues. Therefore, we must look not only at LPG, but at the prospects for biofuels. In one way, biofuels are the easiest things to encourage. Bioethanol can be added to petrol, with no substantial technological modification of the vehicle required. That is the easiest route by which to pursue cleaner and greener fuel. In many parts of the world, bioethanol is commonly added to petrol, and up to about 10 per cent. can be added with no real damage. As hon. Members probably know, the quantities of biofuel used in Brazil are absolutely enormous, and vehicles are modified to run almost totally on biofuels, with little petrol ingredient.

If I were in the Treasury, there are two strategies that I would pursue to encourage biofuels. One might be regarded as more laid back than the other and would simply involve relying on the renewables fuel obligation and on finding a mechanism effectively to enforce it so that we hit our 5.7 per cent. target by 2010. If the Treasury did that, I guess that it might relax, and ethanol could go into the mix at about 5 per cent., or perhaps even 10 per cent. or more, and the world would not change markedly. We could visualise a day on which non-ethanol-added fuels had been gradually phased out, in the same way that leaded fuels were phased out. Indeed, I am informed that some supermarkets are already quietly adding ethanol to the fuel pumps and the customers are not noticing any substantial effect.

If that was all that happened, there would not be a long-term effect on Treasury revenue, because taxation could gradually change from one sort of fuel to another, almost seamlessly. However, that is not necessarily the most obvious way to make progress. Technological issues may need to bottom out and supply-side issues may need to be addressed. We must accept the point that the Department made in a previous debate on the issue that not all biofuels are equally virtuous. Some are developed at the cost of rain forest, which is intrinsically undesirable. Some biofuels are not as efficient as others and, as was previously mentioned, some have to travel an appreciable distance before they reach us, and not, of course, in vehicles powered by biofuels.

A more likely scenario is that ethanol competes head to head—or pump to pump—with other sorts of fuel for some time. That is, biofuels will compete with standard fuel and consumers will need to be tempted by a sustained price differential. According to the producers, the current price differential of about 20p is not sufficient to cover their costs or barely does so, although I guess that perhaps they would say that. One could argue that a further, more substantial cut is required. However, if that cut is made and the consumers are tempted to fill up with biofuel rather than other kinds of fuel, a large slice of the £23 billion revenue that the Treasury currently receives from those of us who drive our cars from place to place will be cut.

If a further cut was made, there would be another dilemma. Who would be rewarded best and how could the Treasury ensure that they were the right people? Would they be the virtuous consumers who chose to move from one pump to another at the forecourt, or would the oil companies benefit, simply by leaving their prices much the same and welcoming the fact that their profit margins had increased a little more? That is a dilemma for the Treasury that I am sure it will think through fairly carefully.

None the less, there is a case for maintaining a price differential between biofuels and other fuels, in tandem with enforcing the renewable fuels obligation, rather than dramatically phasing out the differential, when we simply coerce the petrol companies into providing biofuels or as we approach the target that we wish them to achieve. There is a sound case for saying that a cliff-edge withdrawal of the price differential would not deliver the environmental benefits that we want and would lead to targets being missed.

There is also a case for keeping and perhaps developing the system of capital allowances for those who wish to develop a plant necessary to produce the fuel. That point was underlined recently in a radio programme by the managing director of Argent, who said that without such support we might not have biofuels on a proper commercial basis. I should like the Treasury to respond to that point, because in the previous debate on the issue it was mentioned—not by the Treasury spokesman, obviously—that the Treasury was giving the matter some appreciable thought.

I suspect that to have a truly virtuous outcome we need a combination of carrots and sticks. We need the downward thrust of the renewable fuels obligation and we need the message to go out, loud and clear, to the oil companies. However, we also need the carrot—the differential tax rates, capital grants and allowances—to ensure that supply can meet what we hope is the expected demand.

There is a holy grail being sought. The ideal scenario from the Treasury's point of view is to secure all the environmental benefits without a slump in the tax revenue, and at the same time not suffer any other adverse economic effects, such as an effect on the balance of payments. The proposal that the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) made, to develop our own bioethanol industry, has an economic benefit as well as an environmental one. As we are going to use the stuff, we might as well home produce it as well. Discovering the holy grail, which I am sure is keenly sought in the Treasury, of securing environmental benefits without a consequent massive slump in revenue will take a degree of clever judgment or a Baldrick-like cunning plan. That is what I would like the Minister to address in this debate.

However, I conclude on a slightly techie point that I have raised with the Minister before—I apologise to hon. Members for being almost wilfully obscure. The process of producing biofuel is known as esterification—I am glad that I do not have to say that too many times in this debate—but some manufacturers use a process called filtration to make biodiesel. Nothing in the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 explicitly states that esterification needs to be employed. Producers who use filtration argue that their product satisfies the conditions laid down in the Act and is therefore entitled to the same fiscal benefits. However, the Minister contradicted that in a written answer to me, but did not provide a wholly satisfactory explanation of why biodiesel produced through filtration should be treated differently from biodiesel produced through esterification.

I shall leave the Minister adequate time to respond, but I appreciate that the Government have a difficult problem to address. They depend to a great extent on the duty that they receive from fuels and at the same time they have voluntarily embraced the path of environmental virtue. They must pursue both paths—fiscal probity and environmental virtue—simultaneously. That probably can be done but, without sharing Treasury modelling, it is not easy to see exactly how. However, if the Minister has a Baldrick-like cunning plan that will do the job, I would certainly like to hear about it.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) on securing this debate and on the tone with which he has dealt with the issues. He appreciates that the Treasury has some difficult decisions to make in this territory. I also pay tribute to him, as I know that he has a long-standing interest in the issue, both before coming to the House, on the council on which he served, and since, as a member of the Transport Committee. I am glad to see that he is still a transport spokesperson for the Liberals, after the changes at the top of his party, at the start of the Ming dynasty.

The hon. Gentleman draws our attention to the role of transport and the potential use of transport taxation to deal with climate change, which is one of the most serious problems facing the world and one of the most prominent areas of policy debate. As he would expect, the Government are giving the issue serious attention as we prepare for the Budget and the spending review—I shall take his contribution to this debate as Budget representations if he wishes. Beyond that, the Government are preparing to publish the review of the climate change programme. We are also preparing for the comprehensive spending review, in part through the work on reviewing the economics of climate change that Sir Nick Stern is doing at the behest of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor. Such things are part of the essential preparations for making the big, long-term decisions that face us as a Government and as a nation in the comprehensive spending review.

The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to transport, which is a central sector in meeting the challenge of controlling and reducing the United Kingdom's climate change emissions.

I welcome the interventions made by the hon. Members for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) and for Cheadle (Mark Hunter). The hon. Member for South-West Norfolk is fortunate to have British Sugar and the Wissington plant development in his constituency. For the past two or three years, British Sugar has been discussing the plant with me and I am delighted that the construction is under way. It will be the first bioethanol plant in Britain, but I am sure it will not be the last. British Sugar is clearly blazing a trail in the hon. Gentleman's constituency for others to follow.

The hon. Member for Cheadle paid tribute to his council, Stockport metropolitan borough, for its use of procurement, and in particular for making its fleet of council vehicles LPG-driven. I, too, pay tribute to it, as I do to my own Rotherham metropolitan borough council, which was one of the first local authorities to use its position as a significant procurer and purchaser in the area to turn to green energy sources in its buying of energy.

The hon. Gentleman may not be aware of the two new European Union procurement directives that came into force in this country at the end of January and the guidance that has been produced by the Office of Government Commerce. I encourage him to examine their provisions. The guidance is designed specifically to help procurers in the public sector see how they can use their position in the overall objective and imperative to secure good value for money to achieve some of the environmental aims that he and his council share.

There is no doubt that climate change is one of the most serious global challenges facing us. We need to act at the domestic level to reduce climate change emissions in the UK, but we must recognise that UK emissions form only 2 per cent. of the world's emissions. Therefore, the imperative is to act internationally. The problem is a global one, and it requires co-ordinated global efforts and action. That is why the UK put action to take forward efforts to tackle climate change at the forefront of its G8 and EU presidencies last year.

Since 1997, this Government have taken a different approach from the one that the hon. Member for Southport not unfairly described as the traditional Treasury preoccupation with raising finances through taxation. Within two months of first being elected in 1997—in July—we set out a statement of intent. It detailed the clear intention of the Treasury, at the heart of Government, to use tax and other economic instruments to deliver important environmental objectives, and in particular to support economic growth that was both stable and environmentally sustainable.

The strategy was developed further in the pre-Budget report in November 2002, when we published "Tax and the environment: using economic instruments". It set out the framework of interventions that are open to Government in this area, the economic and principled case that any such policy measures should meet, and the process through which we would develop policy on the use of fiscal and other economic policies to achieve environmental goals.

Specifically on fuels, particularly transport fuels, we developed things further the following year by setting out the alternative fuels framework. It established the rationale for decisions on Government support for alternative fuels that can help to meet environmental objectives, which are at the heart of the hon. Gentleman's concerns. Developed directly from the principles in "Tax and the environment: using economic instruments", the framework aimed, in part, to confirm the principal priority of the environment and the benefits to it in such policy decisions. It also aimed, in part, to provide clarity and certainty for investors in those markets. Therefore, the alternative fuels framework commits the Government to guaranteeing fuel duty differentials for at least three years ahead.

I appreciate the progress that the hon. Gentleman recognises, but in many ways transport taxation is a model of a policy area in which the Government have taken innovative and reforming action to make markets, consumer behaviour and technological developments greener, while balancing concerns about economic growth, incomes and the tax revenues necessary to fund essential public services.

The hon. Gentleman concentrated on biofuels, so I will deal with the points that he raised in the remaining time available.

Dr. Pugh: I welcome everything the Minister said about frameworks, policies and things of that nature. Something is not entirely clear to me, perhaps because of ignorance on my part. When a policy is embraced, put forward and said to have certain effects, the Treasury must have a process by which, after a period of time, an assessment is made as to whether the fiscal or environmental effect is as expected or whether it disappoints and does not achieve the desired end. How is that done specifically? Are any data published to indicate whether the fiscal measure has been a success or a failure?

John Healey: There is indeed such a process. I will send the hon. Gentleman a copy of "Tax and the environment: using economic instruments" and the alternative fuels framework. They set out the criteria and the methodologies that we use and the process that we go through in trying to weigh up these sorts of decisions. If he looks at chapter 7, particularly in the pre-Budget and Budget reports, he will see that where we assess the impact of any tax changes that we make—we do that as a matter of course—we publish the results. I think that he will find those useful.

Tax is a potentially potent policy tool, but it is often relatively blunt. It is usually most useful alongside other measures such as information, regulation or public spending programmes. Biofuels are a leading example of such a policy area. The introduction of the duty discounts to which the hon. Gentleman referred—the 20p per litre duty incentive for both biodiesel and bioethanol—has clearly given a kick-start to an industry and a market in Britain that was starting from a low base. The biofuels industry in the UK grew from virtually nothing to producing about 11 million litres per month by last October; in 2005, there was an eightfold increase from the start of that year.

Industry has consistently told us that the best way to deliver investment in renewable fuels in the longer term is through a framework that goes even further—in other words, one that is not just concentrated on duty discounts. Such a framework would give industry additional certainty for its investment and planning. That is where the renewable transport fuels obligation comes in.

Mr. Fraser: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: I will, but I am conscious of the time and I want to respond to some of the other points.

Mr. Fraser: This is a quick point. Following the EU sugar regime, will the Minister use the Budget to put forward plans to stimulate further the bioethanol industry and to ensure that sugar beet farmers have the incentive to grow beet?

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman anticipates the remarks that I am going to make about the Budget and some of the key decisions that we take. I would caution him that the reform of the common agricultural policy, and the sugar regime in particular, aimed to move away from production subsidies of one kind. We must be careful about moving into a realm where we replace one set of production subsidies with another.

The renewable transport fuels obligation will give the biofuels industry further certainty and will deliver carbon savings of 1 million tonnes per year once the obligation reaches 5 per cent. of road fuel sales. We have examined other instruments to create incentives for the development of biofuels. We will, subject to state aids approval, introduce the 100 per cent. first-year capital allowance, in which the hon. Member for Southport is interested, for biofuels plant that meet certain qualifying criteria. That will work alongside the RTFO to encourage development. At the Budget, we will set the level of the obligation for 2008–09 and—

Venezuela

2.30 pm

Frank Cook (in the Chair): I have just had a semaphore message asking whether jackets can be removed. I should explain that this is a parallel Chamber, so the situation is the same as on the Floor of the House. It is therefore quite contrary to standard protocol for hon. Members to remove their jackets. We have made representations to the Speaker, and once the weather gets sunnier and hotter, it may be permissible for hon. Members to remove their jackets.

Six hon. Members have given prior notice that they want to contribute to the debate. The mover of the debate has indicted that he will take about 15 minutes, which means that other hon. Members who have given notice that they want to speak will get no more than seven and a half minutes each on average. I should therefore be grateful if hon. Members would bear in mind the time when they make their contributions or accept and respond to interventions.

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): Mr. Cook, I hear your wise words about the coming warm weather and about the length of our speeches. Bearing that in mind, I shall take no interventions during my speech, in the hope that hon. Members will be able to speak later.

The debate is about the changes in Latin America. In this country, we talk about Africa a[illegible]DS, about the middle east and about the growth of economic power in India and China, but Latin America is the one continent that seems to have disappeared from our radar. In talking about Latin America, the word that we should use is change, and that is the central issue of the debate. I am pleased to say that that change reflects a move to the left; Opposition Members might not share my feelings, but there we are. That left movement has many variants in countries such as Chile, Brazil, Uruguay, Bolivia and, of course, Venezuela. Indeed, I was delighted to hear the President of Brazil speak to us this morning. The content of his speech was brilliant, and I shall try to deal with it later.

Latin America is a huge continent, which has always been considered to be part of the United States' backyard, and it is important that the United Kingdom does not neglect it. If we look at American history, we come across the practice of the Monroe doctrine and the idea of manifest destiny. Prior to the civil war, the southern states tried to expand the slave empire into the Caribbean and Latin America to perpetuate slavery. I am pleased to say that Lincoln and the Republicans opposed that, although Lincoln would turn in his grave if he could see his party's performance in the current context.

My desire to highlight the changes in Latin America and to seek a positive response recently motivated me to ask the Prime Minister for his perspective on events in Latin America, but my diplomatic response to his answer is that I found it somewhat disappointing. Indeed, some people in Latin America found it more than disappointing, and it created a minor political tsunami. I am told that, as a result of my question, I am more famous in Latin America than in Leeds. However, like you, Mr. Cook, I am an eternal optimist and I requested th[illegible]o enable the Government to clarify their policy towards Venezuela and clear up any confusion. That is especially relevant given what can only be described as the excruciatingly embarrassing remarks by a junior Foreign Office Minister in the columns of The Times on 13 April 2002. He welcomed the overthrow of Chavez in a coup but, unfortunately for him and fortunately for the people of Venezuela, the coup collapsed one day later, when Chavez was restored to his presidency thanks to popular support. My first question to the Minister, therefore, is what efforts have been made since April 2002 to repair the damage that that comment would obviously have caused? Will he, if possible, clarify the Prime Minister's comments about the international agreements that Venezuela has supposedly not upheld?

In a general sense, it is worth asking why we should welcome good relations with Venezuela; indeed, that is the question that we are asking today. For those who like to inhabit the world of realpolitik, there is a straightforward answer. Venezuela has the largest proven conventional oil reserves in south America and the sixth largest in the world, at about 77 billion barrels. Only Saudi Arabia, Iraq, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait and Iran have larger proven reserves. Even in the simplistic sense of having good relations with people who have something that we need, we should encourage the relationship with Venezuela.

Venezuela also possesses huge reserves of heavy crude oil. During the second half of the 1990s, it was the fifth largest oil producer in the world, behind Saudi Arabia, Russia, Iran and the US. It is also a significant producer of gas and has about 3 per cent. of the world's total reserves. Interestingly, those sizeable offshore reserves are being exploited at the moment, and licences are being given to foreign companies. Contrary to the situation with oil companies, the law permits 100 per cent. foreign ownership of projects to exploit non-associated natural gas, so there is an interesting opening for people who are interested in gas, and I am sure that there are a few in this room.

Venezuela is also a significant trading partner for the UK. It is our third largest export market in south America and was worth £187 million in 2004. In the same year, the UK imported £213 million of goods from Venezuela. Several leading British companies have investments in the Venezuelan energy sector, and in tourism, pharmaceuticals, agriculture and finance. My second question to the Minister, therefore, is, bearing all that in mind, can he outline the Government's strategy for enhancing British commercial interests in Venezuela, particularly given the strength of competition from countries such as China in the Venezuelan and wider regional market?

I would argue, however, that a Labour Government's foreign policy should be driven not just by considerations of economic self-interest, but by a shared system of political values. As I am sure you would agree, Mr. Cook, the Labour party has a long and honourable record of supporting progressive Governments around the world and of siding with movements that seek to govern in the interests of the majority and to involve the masses of people who, historically, have been ignored. Interestingly, Venezuela was the first country in Latin America to begin the process of rejecting the domination of what we call neo-liberal ideas and the Washington consensus and to experiment with ideas of anti-globalisation. Some historians take the view that the upsurge of discontent in Caracas in February 1989, which resulted in the death of roughly 1,000 people, was as important for Latin America as the fall of the Berlin wall in the same year was for Europe.

[Colin Burgon]

Whatever the international significance of those events in Caracas, there can be no doubt that they marked the beginning of a domestic political process that eventually led to the victory of Hugo Chavez in December 1998 and catapulted Venezuela into the limelight in Latin America. That was a novel place for Venezuela, because it had previously attracted little interest in terms of its history or politics, other than as the birthplace of Simon Bolivar, although that is fairly important. According to people to whom I spoke at the Foreign Office, Venezuela was never considered an attractive diplomatic posting. The usual take was that Venezuela was an oil-rich country run by a white, Americanised elite, with nearly 70 per cent. of its 24 million people living on the edge of hunger and poverty.

What was the platform on which Chavez came to power and which has caused such ructions on the continent? Given Opposition and US claims about Chavez's democratic legitimacy, it is interesting to note that he had faced the electorate eight times in six years by the end of 2004—a record that has been matched nowhere else in Latin America and which none of us would like to match. The three central themes of his programme were, first, a radical reform of the economy and, surprisingly, an emphasis on following a third way that was inspired by a certain Tony Blair. That approach was based on what Chavez called a middle road between savage neo-liberalism and failed communism. The second plank was the need to overhaul the country's institutions politically and constitutionally. The third element was the importance of diversifying trading relations away from the dependence on the United States that inevitably and unduly shaped Venezuela's development.

The domestic impact of Chavez's politics is clear. After the dramatic rise in oil prices in 2002 following the failed coup, the Venezuelan Government invested more than $3 billion in social policy reforms in 2005. A series of social investment programmes called missions cover such matters as pre-school education, primary education and literacy, secondary education, vocational worker training, primary health care in the most deprived neighbourhoods and a food distribution programme that covers 60 per cent. of the population. It is estimated that just over 1 million people have acquired literacy skills as a result of those programmes. The poorest in that country have access to medical assistance for the first time ever, thanks partly to the 17,000 medics provided by Cuba.

At international level, President Chavez has attempted to build and broaden links with other countries on the continent. The oil wealth of Venezuela has enabled him to develop regional energy accords with his Caribbean and Latin American neighbours to help with debt problems facing countries such as Argentina and Ecuador, and thereby reduce the influence of the International Monetary Fund in the region. He has even been able to fund regional social programmes such as mission miracle, which enables poor Latin Americans to receive free eye treatment in Venezuela and Cuba.

Venezuela's increasingly active role has met with outright hostility on the part of the right-wing Republican Administration in Washington. As recently as 16 February, Condoleezza Rice called for an "international united front" against Venezuela. In what can only be described as an extremely condescending comment, she said that the State Department was "working with responsible governments, even responsible governments of the left, like the Brazilian government or the Chilean government, to try and counter these"—

Venezuelan—

"influences."

Fortunately, both those Governments have strongly rebutted Ms Rice's statements.

There is great danger in the American attempt to isolate Venezuela. The issue that is playing on America's mind at the moment is links with Iran. There is no future in links with a fundamentalist Islamic regime such as Iran. It is up to the UK to use its position to argue for secular politics that unites us all. It would be bad news if Venezuela was influenced by Islamic fundamentalism coming out of Tehran, just as it would be if it was influenced by Christian fundamentalism coming out of Washington.

Central to the debate is the question of who determines our foreign policy on that huge and changing continent. Can the Minister reassure me that our policy is not being subcontracted out to right-wing elements in the US, and will he show me evidence of how our policy is clearly different in this respect? Does he share my view and that of almost 100 of my parliamentary colleagues—I refer to early-day motion 1644—that all elected Governments in the region should be treated with equal respect and that the US right-wing fundamentalists should desist from efforts to destabilise the democratically elected Chavez Government?

Having listened to President Lula of Brazil this morning, I believe it is clear that fundamental and welcome change is under way in Latin America. Venezuela is at the forefront of that process. How we determine our policy towards that nation will say much about this country. I hope that friendship, solidarity and mutual respect will mark that relationship.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. I see seven hon. Members seeking to catch my eye. I am required to start the first of the three winding-up speeches at 3.30 pm, which gives us 46 minutes. Will hon. Members please bear that in mind when making their contributions? I call Daniel Kawczynski.

2.44 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Cook. I have visited Venezuela. I had the opportunity to visit Caracas and some of the outlying towns, and it is a beautiful country with a remarkable people, so I am pleased that the hon. Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) secured the debate. I find myself agreeing with much of what he said. Hugo Chavez, because he has been democratically elected as the Head of State of Venezuela, deserves a certain respect that some other leaders around the world do not, because they came to power through military coups or other non-democratic methods. We certainly need to improve relations with Venezuela. I remember the hon. Gentleman asking his question of the Prime Minister and the furore that followed in the media.

One thing that the hon. Gentleman did not say is that a senior member of the Republican party in the United States—I cannot remember who exactly—called last year for the assassination of Hugo Chavez. That troubled me greatly. The idea that we could call for democratically elected Heads of State to be assassinated is very worrying. I dissociate myself from that and I hope that the Minister will do so.

American allies, wherever they are around the world, sometimes disagree with America and they do not suffer as a result. One such country is Canada. Canada has great relations with America, yet it sometimes goes out of its way to have a different policy from the United States. An example is the relations and the trade that it has with Cuba. I hope that the Minister will say that we are prepared at times to deviate slightly from the American position and that we must pursue first and foremost our own interests, rather than just complying with what the Americans suggest to us.

As the hon. Member for Elmet mentioned, there are many British oil companies in Venezuela, and they generate a great deal of revenue for this country. I am talking about oil and gas production. I am sure that a company such as BP will be grateful that the debate has been secured and that we have an opportunity to discuss the issues. Venezuela is the third largest economy in Latin America, so it provides the United Kingdom with a tremendous opportunity for direct foreign investment. That might be more difficult if we are deliberately provocative and antagonistic to its leaders.

I will be brief, because I am well aware that other hon. Members wish to speak, but I want to make two other points. Venezuela has a shoreline that meets the Caribbean sea, and we have a vessel in the Caribbean. I was meant to be going on it, as I am on the armed forces parliamentary scheme, with the Navy. It is patrolling for drugs in the Caribbean.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Parachute him in.

Daniel Kawczynski: Venezuela has an important role to play in dealing with the narcotics trade across the Caribbean. I hope that we can work closely with the Venezuelan Government on narcotics issues to deal with the growing problem that they present. Of course, that issue affects not only the United States, but the United Kingdom.

Next to Venezuela is British Guyana. That former British colony is very important to us. It is a member of the Commonwealth, and obviously we want to do everything that we can to safeguard its position. In the past, Guyana has had small territorial disputes with Venezuela, and I am keen that we enter a dialogue with Venezuela to ensure that those disputes do not erupt again. The Minister is very capable and I urge him to redouble his efforts to improve our relations with Venezuela, and not to denigrate the elected President of that country. I have my own feelings on him as an individual, but he was democratically elected and we must work with him.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 41 minutes left and seven hon. Members are bidding to speak. I call Jon Trickett.

2.49 pm

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Cook; I will try to be brief. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) on securing this debate on an issue that is important strategically for the part of south America that we are discussing. It is also important in terms of the way that the world is developing, given the globalisation that we are all experiencing.

The American Administration's position might be more nuanced than is reflected in some of the more extreme and bellicose statements that emerge from time to time. Not so long ago, there were discussions that seemed to be positive between parts of that Administration and representatives of the Venezuelan Government. However, it is also true that many bellicose statements are coming out of Washington, and from very senior sources. The statement about assassinating Chavez came not from someone in the Administration, but from someone on the Republican right—I think it was Pat Robertson—but many statements have been made that lead one to be very troubled about what the American Administration's intentions are. This debate provides our Government with an opportunity to clarify their role.

I recently read a document produced by an organisation called the Centre for Security Policy in Washington. It is doing some of the outriding—or some of the more outrageous thinking, some Members might think—in respect of Venezuela. It states that Venezuela

"must change. It can change on its own, or it can invite hemispheric forces with the help of Venezuela's broad democratic opposition, to impose the changes. Either way U.S. strategy must be to help Venezuela accomplish peaceful change" this year. It is clear that there are extreme right-wing forces in the American Administration that will not tolerate the direction of travel of the Venezuelan Government and the international linkages that they are bringing about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet referred to the Washington consensus. I think it is true that one can perceive a world view coming out of the neo-conservative establishment. Many such neo-conservatives are closely associated with George Bush, Cheney, Rumsfeld and their colleagues. The Washington consensus implies a world in which the trade is so-called "free", capital markets are entirely liberalised, property rights are secured, there is market deregulation, there is a major transfer of assets from the public to the private sectors, the state has a minimal role, and the international alliances that are created are grouped around a Washington hegemonic presence—a unipolar world. It has been explicitly stated that that is what America aspires to create. The Washington consensus also implies that America has the right to impose what it would describe as a pax Americana on the world—that it has the right to conduct unilateral and pre-emptive wars, should that be necessary. In respect of building a foreign policy on Venezuela, the question is whether our Government want to construct a set of bilateral relations that are built on the Washington consensus, or whether they will develop, with the European Union and others, a more nuanced approach.

One problem with what Washington wants to impose on the world is that it produces an extremely divided form of development for those in what we call the third world—the developing countries. In Latin America, the richest 10 per cent. control 48 per cent. of the income, and the poorest 10 per cent. share 1.6 per cent. of the income. The Washington consensus—the neo-liberal project—produces the most divided societies imaginable. Chavez has attempted to demonstrate that there is an alternative model for development that can tackle poverty, and which, through microcredits and other detailed Government initiatives, can begin to share the wealth. In doing that, Venezuela has been able to take advantage of its oil wealth, but it has also begun to develop a set of international alliances that do not easily fit into the Washington model of a world grouped around a single pole of power—American power, based on Republican Administration. Washington regards that as particularly threatening, and that explains the bellicose statements that have come out of elements of the Administration.

Chavez and the Venezuelan Government are demonstrating that it is possible to develop a set of international relationships that do not fit into the Washington consensus. What will the UK Government and the EU do? How will they respond to that? I hope that the UK Government are able to establish a line that does not simply support the idea of an unipolar world—of a single economic and military interest—and that instead they will develop a much more complex approach to Venezuela and the Latin American continent. I hope that we can play a positive role by sitting alongside Venezuela and the other nations in that region that are following a different strategy for developing and spreading out the wealth than the one that Washington seeks to impose on the world.

I notice that I have been speaking for six minutes and 18 seconds, so I shall now sit down.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): We have 34 remaining minutes, and six hon. Members are bidding to speak. I call Mark Pritchard.

2.56 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Clearly we are in agreement that President Chavez is democratically elected, but we all know from our history that there have been other characters throughout the generations who have also been democratically elected but who have not necessarily had the best record on human rights and looking after their own people. I will not list them now, because they are too numerous to list.

There is no doubt that there is a democratic mandate, and I hope that the wealth that Venezuela has as a result of its oil reserves and the recent rises in crude oil prices will cascade down to the poorest and most vulnerable in Venezuelan society. Some hon. Members have said that they think that that is happening. They might wish to speak to organisations such as the Department for International Development and CARE and other non-governmental and charitable organisations. Unfortunately, there is a sorry tale of poverty and deprivation not only in large parts of Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, but throughout the country. I think that the wealth that President Chavez currently has would be better spent on addressing that, rather than on mobilising 2 million civilians and training them in the basic techniques of how to handle an AK47. I think also that addressing that would be a better way of spending money than procuring Russian helicopters for some bogus threat. It is, of course, very convenient for the president to have a phoney war with the United States. I agree with those Members who say that the rhetoric from Washington should be cautious. The American Administration—both the Department of Defence and the Department of State—should not play into President Chavez's hands on this issue. But even if they do, that does not mean that President Chavez should put military equipment before his own people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) made an excellent point when he said that the Government of Venezuela need to put more effort into dealing with the drugs trade. Many of those drugs end up on the streets of London and in other parts of our nation.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I welcome my hon. Friend's remarks. Would he not agree that the example set by President Lula of Brazil, who has adopted—if I dare say so—a third-way approach to economic development in south America offers better long-term prospects for that continent than the route being followed by Hugo Chavez?

Mark Pritchard: Those are helpful remarks. President Lula rose from very humble beginnings; he was a shoeshine boy, so he knows the pressures of poverty. President Chavez is a former paratrooper. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made a comment about parachuting in one of my colleagues; President Chavez would know how to parachute into another location.

Latin America needs leaders who send out clear signals to the investment community that their countries are safe, secure and stable and a good place in which to do business. One of the unfortunate things about President Chavez is his rhetoric, which seems to be ratcheting up week by week. In the past week or so there have been comments about imperial enemies; there has been the so-called crusade against capitalism—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and there is the axis between Cuba, which has a terrible human rights record, and President Chavez. If Labour Members wish to put in jeopardy their constituents' pension funds, which may be in investments in companies such as British Gas, they can carry on cheering President Chavez and President Castro of Cuba. We cannot have a divestment of British interests in Venezuela; those interests cannot be put at risk by a president who is sending out entirely the wrong signals to the investment community.

Of course, the situation has a negative halo effect on the rest of Latin America. There are many success stories in Latin America, and it would be most unfortunate if, as a result of one rogue president, the investment community decides to invest elsewhere. There are good examples, such as President Lula. I was in Peru a few weeks ago, and presidential elections are coming up there in the next two or three weeks. I had the privilege of meeting several of the presidential candidates. One in particular, Lourdes Flores, is very impressive. I hope that President Chavez will be far more responsible in his rhetoric.

Of course, the issue affects UK relations directly. We know that President Chavez has been encouraging Argentina to look again at the Falkland Islands, and to make yet more protests at the United Nations. That is disturbing to me and, no doubt, to others who fought to bring the Falkland Islands back under the Union flag.

In conclusion, there is no doubt that there has been anti-American rhetoric in this House yet again; indeed, we hear it all the time. It is not the Washington model that is causing President Chavez to threaten neighbours and use anti-American and anti-British rhetoric; it is an International Monetary Fund model, and a World Bank model, that Latin American countries have been following. It is an international model with international consensus, in which Britain plays a part, that Latin American countries have been asked to follow in relation to their fiscal and borrowing policies.

I hope that the Minister will confirm today that there will be no more closure of UK diplomatic missions and embassies in Latin America, given that it is becoming increasingly important in our own foreign policy. I hope also that he will confirm that we will continue to have a commercial presence, through our embassies, in as many Latin American countries as we currently do, so that British interests are protected, and so that we can take the opportunities available in the region.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 27 minutes available and five bidders. I call John McDonnell.

3.3 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I apologise to the Front-Bench spokesmen, because I am chairing a meeting on the Company Law Reform Bill at 3.30 pm and so cannot be here for the winding-up speeches, although I did not want to miss this debate because I am chair of the "Hands Off Venezuela" campaign.

Today is international women's day, and I want to place on the record our respect for, and celebration of, the role of women in the Venezuelan revolution—and it is a revolution. For most of us, revolution conjures up images of armed struggle and blood-spilling, but Venezuela makes us reconsider that stereotype. Since 1998, when Hugo Chavez was elected President, and especially since 2002 and 2003, the unarmed population of Venezuela have defeated first a coup and then a sabotage of the oil industry, both backed by the US Administration. Those major events launched a process of dramatic change in the country, which was supported by the Venezuelan people, particularly the women.

The women of Venezuela have constituted the vast majority of participants in every Government campaign to eradicate poverty and raise the population's quality of life. President Chavez has pointed out that it is mostly women at the grass roots who have run the education and health missions to which my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) referred, the literacy, primary, secondary and university programmes, and the health committees that manage the 20,000 mainly Cuban doctors who live and work in the community. Those missions have transformed the country. Venezuela was declared free of illiteracy in 2005. More than a million more children are now attending school and getting three free meals a day. Everyone now has access to free health care.

The women whose labour has enabled those vital services have been transformed themselves. It is women who formed land committees in both rural and urban areas, so that families who migrated from the countryside to the city after the oil boom of the 1960s, and who ended up on squatted land, now have the deeds to their homes. Idle land in the countryside is being distributed. Co-operatives are encouraged, so that Venezuela can stop being dependent on imports for 65 per cent. of its basic foods and so that food security can be ensured. A network of state markets, also run mostly by women, make subsidised food available throughout the country, and soup kitchens ensure that street children and others without income receive the nutrition that they need.

No one is left out of the community's concern. Women's knowledge of the community and their eagerness to work for the benefit of all have been central to the spread of the revolution in care. It was largely women who mobilised the electorate during the 2004 presidential referendum that ratified President Chavez's election to power with a 60/40 majority. That shows how determined women are not to lose their elected leader and what they have gained as a result of his work.

Again, on international women's day it is appropriate to highlight President Chavez's recent announcement that the poorest housewives, mainly single mothers, will receive a payment of about $180 a month—equivalent to 85 per cent. of the minimum wage—not as charity, but as recognition of the fact that raising children is a social and economic contribution to the whole of society, and of the fact that they are workers in the home. The minimum wage was in turn raised by 15 per cent., and there have been increases in pensions and other low wages. The first 100,000 women will benefit in June, and another 100,000 will benefit from July. Up to 500,000 women will eventually get that wage for their vital, unwaged work.

The president has repeatedly said that women are the poorest and work the hardest. He has told them:

> "They work so hard raising their children . . . This was never recognised as work yet it is such hard work . . . Now the revolution puts you first, you too are workers, you housewives, workers in the home."

That was recognised in the constitution; article 88 recognises the economic and social contribution of women's work in the home and on that basis grants housewives a pension. That has been hailed worldwide as a breakthrough, not least because it is bound to raise all women's wages, as at least some women will now have the power to refuse the lowest pay. Article 88 still needs legislation to put it into practice, but rather than wait for that, Chavez has put together the recognition in article 88 of caring work and recent legislation aimed at lifting the poorest out of poverty, and has redirected some of the oil revenues to women.

All over the world, women have been campaigning for economic recognition for unwaged caring work in order to underline women's poverty in both unwaged and waged workplaces. In 1995, the UK-based Global Women's Strike got the UN to agree that unwaged work should be measured and valued in national accounts. In fact, a ten-minute Bill was introduced in the House on that issue. In 2005, Global Women's Strike organised a speaking tour for Nora Castaneda, president of the Women's Development Bank of Venezuela, to let people outside Venezuela know about the far-reaching article 88. Global Women's Strike has just published a book, "Creating a Caring Economy", in which Nora Castaneda explains how that micro-credit bank is helping to build a movement that is "creating an economy at the service of human beings".

The people of Venezuela believe that their oil and natural resources belong to the people themselves. Today, women are marching to the US embassy in Caracas to deliver a petition demanding an end to the occupation of Iraq. They have also spoken out against intervention in Haiti by the US. They will not tolerate any intervention intent on depriving them of the wealth from the oil revenues of their own country. The task of all democrats and progressives throughout the world is to support the revolution, and in particular the struggle of the Venezuelan women.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 21 minutes remaining and four hon. Members bidding. I call David Taylor.

3.9 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I was pleased to hear that the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) wants us to deviate somewhat from the American position on Venezuela—I paraphrase a little—and that the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) seemed sceptical of some American rhetoric. I am happy to fall in line with that, because much of the shape of UK relations with Venezuela is due to American attitudes to that country.

I shall try, in my five minutes, to summarise and give a considered response to sundry allegations. The first allegation, from the USA and the anti-Chavez lobby in Venezuela, is that the Venezuelan Government have used electoral fraud and manipulation to retain power and free and fair elections in the country cannot be guaranteed by the Chavez-controlled CNE. That common line of argument is central to the attempt to portray Chavez as authoritarian and despotic.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) said, there have been many electoral processes in the country during the Chavez Government. In fact, there have been 11 since 1998, which have been passed by international election observers who have played a prominent, visible role in every election. That authenticates the election of Chavez and rebuts the arguments of the United States of America, which has financed and supported an Opposition-identified civil society organisation, Súmate, which campaigns for so-called free and fair elections. The leaders of that organisation will go on trial shortly for receiving foreign support for their activities, which is against Venezuelan law. That will be a serious test for US-Venezuelan relations. If Súmate's leaders are found guilty of treason, bilateral relations between the US and Venezuela will worsen.

The United States of America often argues that the Venezuelan Government are illegitimate and have undermined democracy in Venezuela. That is based on the claim that the abstention rate has been high in every election and referendum process, so the President only represents a minority in Venezuelan society and the Bolivarian revolution is illegitimate. However, the problem is that abstention has traditionally been high in Venezuela; it has declined a little under the Chavez Government, but it is still too high for a Government committed to creating a model of protagonistic, participatory democracy. This has been linked to voter fatigue, with a constant cycle of elections, wasted-vote syndrome, and so on.

There are three other main accusations, which I shall just list without responding to them. First, it has been said that the Chavez Government are engaged in the suppression, torture and abuse of their opponents and have undermined freedom of speech. Secondly, it is alleged that they have armed their supporters. In fact, during the build-up to the 2002 coup attempt, it was alleged that the Government were arming the Bolivarian circles, but no evidence was ever brought forward to substantiate that claim. Such a development would have been resisted by the Venezuelan armed forces, because it would have undermined their monopoly of arms. Thirdly, the final charge that is routinely made by American diplomats, and others in the Administration, is that the Venezuelan Government are channelling financial support to terrorist organisations and undermining democracy and democratic government in the region.

In the one minute and 20 seconds that I have left, I should like to ask some questions of the Minister, who I greatly respect. In September 2005, the US State Department condemned Venezuela, along with Myanmar, for non-compliance in the global war on drugs. Can the Minister provide an assessment of the status of the UK relationship with Venezuela on narcotic drug enforcement matters?

The US State Department has also claimed that the Chavez Government are supporting, harbouring and financing terrorist and anti-US rebel groups across the region. Frequent allusions of ties to Islamic terrorism have been made and reported in the US media. Does the Minister have any information or intelligence that he can share that could shed light on those allegations, which remain unsubstantiated by the United States?

The US Government strategy of isolating Chavez and distinguishing between so-called good and bad left-of-centre Governments in south America has been totally counter-productive. Do our Government take the view that all elected Governments in the region should be treated with equal respect and that the US should desist from efforts to stabilise the democratically elected Government of Venezuela?

Finally, in the context of all the comments that have been made, does the Minister not think that it is time for a wider international debate on the legitimacy and legality of the United States' so-called democracy promotion efforts, through institutions such as the National Endowment for Democracy? I am lacking time, but the Minister is good at delivering when he says he will write to hon. Members and I am sure that he will do so today.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 16 minutes for three hon. Members.

3.14 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): The speech-to-minute rate is getting better all the time and I shall do my best to improve it.

It is hard to start without mentioning the remarks and comments of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard). Why does he think that there is such a disparity of wealth and poverty and land ownership in Venezuela? Why does he think that the people of Venezuela are overwhelmingly behind a President who promises to use the nation's wealth to conquer the poverty, rather than hand the money to the richest in the country, which is basically what has been happening for the past 100 years?

Mark Pritchard rose—

Jeremy Corbyn: No, I will not give way, because I have just five minutes.

The Bolivarian revolution of the 1820s got independence from Spain, which was a tremendous achievement. Bolivar himself led independence throughout the continent. The problem is that he did not live long enough. After his death, the independence movement essentially fell into the hands of the landowning aristocracies in country after country. The landowning pattern in Venezuela was no different from many others in that continent, because of the unfairness of land distribution.

The discovery of oil in Venezuela in the 1920s did not lead to a liberation of the livelihoods of the people of Venezuela, but to a decline in agriculture and a continuation of unfairness and fabulous wealth for a small proportion of the population as a result. The Bolivarian revolution—the second one, led by Hugo Chavez—is righting the wrongs of the last two centuries. That cannot all be done in five years, or 10, but it has made a good start and has inspired a large number of people throughout the continent.

Recently, a number of the hon. Members who are taking part in this debate attended a seminar about Venezuela and Latin America as a whole, during which lots of issues were raised about British and other investments. I gently say to the hon. Member for The Wrekin that many companies in the City of London have made a fantastic amount of money from Latin America during the past 200 years, one of them being the Vestey Corporation, which the hon. Gentleman should know plenty about, because it has funded the Conservative party over the past 100 years and assisted it in its endeavours. The Vestey Corporation is a major landowner in Venezuela, along with many others, and it should think about returning some of its profits to assist the conquering of poverty in that country, rather than having the hon. Gentleman blathering on about defending its investments there at the present time.

Mark Pritchard rose—

Jeremy Corbyn: No, I am not giving way, because I only have five minutes, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. He took more than his five minutes, I have to say.

What is happening in Venezuela is important in the context of Latin America. The right-wing commentators in the US and Britain say, "It's all individuals and Chavez is some kind of idiosyncratic nutter who is on his own." However, talk to people in Argentina, Chile, Brazil, Mexico or any country in the region, and they will say different; they see what is happening in Venezuela and Bolivia as, at last, the beginning of the fair distribution of resources for the benefit of the majority of people in the continent, rather than a small number.

The United States seeks to lecture other countries on democracy and human rights, but there is one part of Cuba where there is a gross abuse of human rights: it is called Guantanamo Bay and it should be shut down. Until George Bush gets around to closing down Guantanamo Bay, he should tone down the rhetoric concerning human rights anywhere else in the continent.

Large numbers of people attended the recent World Social Forum in Venezuela, including a delegation from my constituency comprising two people—Gary Heather and Tricia Clarke—who brought back an interesting report on what they had observed about how the poor people had not just been helped by the revolution, but felt empowered by it. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). I quote from Tricia Clarke's comment:

> "Women play an important part in the social revolution that is taking place in Venezuela. Women are participating in all the projects in the barrios and speak proudly of Chavez and the changes that are taking place."

That is an example of how many people around the world feel inspired by visiting Venezuela and seeing the huge changes taking place there.

What the British Government need to do is not make the kind of remarks that the Prime Minister made to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) in the House, but understand that the people of Latin America feel that they have had enough of the Monroe doctrine and the lectures from above—from the north. What happened at the Buenos Aires trade summit is an example of the growing unity of the poorest people across the region to demand their place in the sun, their share of resources and their escape from the poverty that they have lived in for too long.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): There are 11 minutes for the two speakers remaining.

3.20 pm

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Cook. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) on securing this debate and on his commitment to what Venezuela represents in the modern world.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) made a valuable point when he said that Venezuela is a beautiful country with beautiful people. Anybody who has visited rural Venezuela will know how spectacularly beautiful it can be and anybody who has seen the Venezuelan people will know how fine and beautiful they are. However, someone who has visited the country will also know that as one travels from the airport to Caracas, one passes through some of the worst slums on the planet. That is sadly typical of large parts of the large cities of Latin America. Those slums are dire in their poverty and, historically, living conditions for the ordinary people have been abject. The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) talked about the concept of wealth cascading down. However, one of Venezuela's problems has been that, in the oil years, the wealth certainly did cascade—but not down to the poorest people, who were denied and who were probably harmed by the curse of oil.

I should like to recall some individual human moments. I remember walking through one of the poorer parts of Caracas some years ago. I talked to a young woman. She did not look old enough even to be a mother, but a toddler was holding her hand and she was heavily pregnant with her next child. I asked her what she wanted for the future. She said, "I would like my son to get an education and become a lawyer. I would like my unborn baby to become a doctor." I remember walking away from that woman—who was another tragedy, another statistic of Venezuela's poverty—thinking that no way could those children aspire to such things. That woman was another victim of Latin America's poverty, in a land where there could be plenty.

The Venezuelan Government are committed to pro-poor policies that look to advance educational opportunities for the poorest people. We have heard the statistics about the eradication of illiteracy among some in Venezuela and about the opportunities in respect of health care, income support and security. Those kinds of policies can begin to transform the lives of some of those who, historically, have been among the most destitute.

I say to hon. Members who talk about a good investment climate that we should talk about a good climate for the ordinary people of Venezuela. Let us talk about the young woman I mentioned and what she needs. She needs stability and some share in the wealth and asset base of her country, and at last there is a Government committed to doing such things. That is why President Chavez has been remarkably popular every time he has had to face an electoral test.

I turn to Britain's national interest. We can talk about that; it is legitimate that we should. Of course we want a good climate. I also want BP to operate successfully in Venezuela. I have seen its operations there, and they are good for Venezuela as long as the resource base goes to those entitled to it. I suppose that it is also good for world energy supplies in so far as we are oil-dependent. What BP wants is a stable country; we need to work towards an investment climate in which there is stability for Venezuela. However, that will not be achieved through a lecturing tone from anywhere.

We do not often find western European countries adopting such a tone, although every now and again there are lapses. However, from Washington there is all the classic foolishness of the north American approach to Latin America that we have seen over the years. Some time ago, I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) that I knew too well that when Vice-President Nixon visited Caracas in 1958, he was spat at by the crowds.

The north Americans were unpopular then, and they are doing their best to make themselves unpopular now through their hectoring, language and rhetoric and through the real threat that seems implied by that kind of rhetoric—a threat that north America might want to act in some tangible way to destroy what the Venezuelan Government are trying to do. That is not the right way forward for our national interest, nor for our Government's real commitment to international partnership and development. We do not need such things from north America and should give a strong signal that it is not the Government of Hugo Chavez who are on trial, but the policy of the United States on Latin America that is under test.

In the final few moments of my contribution, I shall say simply this: I do not know where the young woman I talked about went to and I do not know about the children who sleep rough in Caracas; many thousands will do so tonight. However, I do know that we ought to be supporting—although not uncritically—a Government who are driving against the evils in a city such as Caracas and a country such as Venezuela. We ought to say that we celebrate the pro-poor policies of the Government in Venezuela, who are moving the agenda.

3.26 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): Thank you for this opportunity, Mr. Cook. I have just spent the past hour cutting back my speech from the allotted 10 minutes to give more time for the Minister to reply. I shall be brief—some important issues have been raised, and the Minister ought to have time to reply to them in what has been a good and well balanced debate.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) on securing this debate. When he and I visited the United States in the summer of 1997, I remember hearing about his interest in south America—particularly in its civil war issues—and he demonstrated some of those interests today. There have been valuable contributions. I particularly enjoyed that of my near neighbour, the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski). The comments made by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) were also particularly good. The history lesson we received from the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) set much of today's debate in context.

It is well known that many countries in south America are and have been hostile to the current and previous US Administrations and have a purported belief that the United States is an imperial power seeking to dominate their region. Much of that is perfectly understandable.

I agree with the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) that the policy of the United States in the region does it enormous harm.

Speaking as one who regards himself as a friend of America, I wish that America would understand how some of its comments and perceptions are seen overseas. We all know the statistics about how few US Congressmen hold passports and how little they travel. If they travelled more overseas, as many of us do, perhaps they would understand some of the damage they do. Given that issues such as Guantanamo Bay are still going on, it is clear why there is great suspicion.

Relations between Britain and Venezuela have undoubtedly suffered in recent weeks, since the intervention of the hon. Member for Elmet at Prime Minister's questions. Today's debate is about Venezuelan-British relations, and there is much to celebrate about them. I should like to consider some of the things to be celebrated before coming to those that we should not necessarily celebrate.

For example, trade and investment between the UK and Venezuela have shown that both countries can benefit from a decent trading relationship. The United Kingdom is the fifth largest investor in Venezuela. I shall not repeat the figures given by the hon. Member for Elmet, but they show that the UK and Venezuela have strong trade and investment relations, which should be nurtured in the future to the benefit of both countries. My first question to the Minister is whether there has been any noticeable decline in our trade interests as a result of the spat of the past few weeks. If that has been the case, it is unfortunate for us and for the kind of trickle-down of wealth that we would all like to see in Venezuela.

There are also strong cultural links that show a rewarding relationship between our two countries. The British Council, for example, runs many cultural programmes covering the arts, English language training and education, and there are several opportunities for Venezuelan postgraduate students to study in the United Kingdom; since those schemes began in the mid-1980s, more than 300 scholarships have been awarded. Cultural ties between the UK and Venezuela are vital and I hope that whatever our differences about the Falkland Islands, and about what Condy Rice may or may not have said, we shall continue to encourage such contacts.

As has been said today, there are reasons why we should welcome the Government of Hugo Chavez and why he should be admired. Not only has he sought to broaden health care and education provisions, but he has used the oil revenues in a way that previous Administrations in his country did not. Many residents in the poorest areas of Venezuela now have access to basic health care, whereas before they had nothing.

I remember my visit to Venezuela some 15 years ago. I saw the slums that the hon. Member for Manchester, Central referred to, but I was also astonished at the huge wealth of the country. In one district through which I drove, on one side of the mountain there were slums—people were literally living in cardboard boxes—and on the other people were living in armoured houses with security guards, dogs and barbed wire. The disparity between rich and poor was amazing, and we should support anything that can be done to reduce it.

There is another side to the matter. I am worried, for example, about the human rights agenda in Venezuela. In the tenth world democracy audit covering 2004, Venezuela came 126th out of 210 countries, with the same score as Côte d'Ivoire and Iraq. Since winning the national referendum on his presidency in 2004, President Chavez and his majority coalition in Congress have tried to undermine the independence of the judiciary by trying to pack the supreme court with their supporters. They learned that from Washington; it is not unusual in the Americas for that to happen. However, it is a matter for concern.

The Administration have enacted legislation that could seriously threaten press freedoms and freedom of expression. For example, one amazing clampdown that has occurred has been the banning of pot clanging—a popular way of protesting against the Government. That was highlighted in the Foreign Office's human rights report. In addition, Amnesty International has expressed concern about and we are aware that there have been some very ugly scenes on both sides in confrontations between the supporters of the Opposition and the security forces.

"the political polarisation which is threatening to destabilise Venezuela",

Today's debate is about the future of UK-Venezuela relations. I want to make sure that the Minister has plenty of time to answer the very real concerns that have been expressed by me and by colleagues from across the House. Undoubtedly, the Government of President Chavez has, perhaps for the first time in Venezuela's history, tried to tackle the huge disparity between wealth and poverty in that country. He has tried to use the oil revenues that he is lucky enough to preside over to help the people of his country in a way that no previous leader has done, and his task has been made more difficult by some of the comments that have emanated from the right wing of the Republican party in the United States. Nevertheless, there are concerns about human rights. It is not, as is always the case in such countries, a black and white issue as I hope that the Minister's response will show.

3.32 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am glad to respond for the official Opposition for the second time today in this Chamber. I congratulate the hon. Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) on securing the debate. There have been some excellent contributions, and I hope that the message that comes out of this debate will be that this House is not too polarised about Venezuela. It is clearly in this country's interests to have excellent relations with Venezuela. It is the world's fifth largest oil producer, as we have already heard, there is huge potential for export there—to which I shall allude in a minute—and we have a great many imports from it, too.

Indeed we have had good relations with Venezuela for a considerable time—after all, Simon Bolivar visited this country as Venezuela's liberator as long ago as 1810, and President Chavez visited the UK as the guest of the British Government in October 2001. In return, the hon. Member for Harlow (Bill Rammell), when he was a Foreign Office Minister, visited Venezuela in 2004, and the Venezuelan Minister for Energy and Mines visited the UK in that same year. It is very much in our interests to maintain those good relations.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

I am going to pull the leg of the hon. Member for Elmet slightly, because I want to refer to his 17 February article in The Guardian. He referred to the Prime Minister's answer during Prime Minister's questions by saying:

"The Prime Minister's response surprised many of us on the Labour benches. Skilled diplomat that he undoubtedly is, Blair's response seemingly lacked any nuance of diplomacy."

We would all say "amen" to that. It was clearly listened to in Caracas, and the unfortunate comments that came from there in response have not been helpful to UK-Venezuelan relations.

I almost agreed entirely with the final paragraph of the article. The hon. Member for Elmet stated:

"It is time that the UK re-engaged with Latin America and offered moral support to regimes intent on social justice and"— the one bit that I do not agree with—

"redistribution of wealth. In light of our participation in the invasion of Iraq and global perception of UK foreign policy, I believe it is highly advisable to employ constructive language and diplomacy"

—which is what I hope we have achieved in this debate—

"so that this country can interact with other sovereign states with an independent, open and progressive agenda. UK foreign policy should not be allowed to be hijacked by other states acting in their own interests, which may not be compatible with our own."

Perhaps, therefore, some of the comments that have come out of Washington are not helpful either. We obtain—I learned from a parliamentary answer—only some 2.2 to 2.4 per cent. of our oil imports from Venezuela, but the United States imports a million barrels a day, so it is a very big customer of that country.

David Taylor: May I put it to the hon. Gentleman that in the Venezuelan context, the objective of having social justice without redistribution of wealth is rather like having an egg without the yolk? Do the two things not go inextricably together?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the hon. Gentleman will just contain himself for a little while, perhaps he will see where I am coming from on that.

As has been said, exports to Venezuela were worth £187 million in 2004—principally in the sectors of chemicals, beverages, medicine and pharmaceutical products. Venezuela is the UK's third largest export market in Latin America, after Brazil and Mexico. Imports from Venezuela, worth £213 million in 2004, were mainly in petroleum and petroleum products, and the main UK investors in Venezuela are BP, Shell, Wood group, BOC Gases, Anglo-American Mining, GlaxoSmithKline, AstraZeneca, Diageo, Unilever and BAT. My briefing note must be out of date because it also mentions the Vestey group, which has had most of its land seized by the Chavez Government. That, of course, is not helping with inward investment into Venezuela; it does not create a good climate.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I will happily give way, but before I do, I should perhaps declare a slight interest in the subject: I am closely related to the Vestey family.

Jeremy Corbyn: Then the hon. Gentleman will be able to answer my question. How much of the land that was seized was lying idle at the time of its seizure?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: That was complete propaganda put about by the Chavez Government. The Vestey family had been in Venezuela for about 70 years and had farmed that land in a way that was well in advance technologically of that used for most of the rest of the land in Venezuela.

Mark Pritchard: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be absolutely wrong for those on the Opposition Benches to encourage or condone nationalisation of British interests paid for by British companies and British taxpayers in Venezuela?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I would simply say that I hope that all countries—particularly oil-rich countries such as Venezuela—will encourage a climate in which inward investment from foreign countries is welcome. If I have time, I should like to show that inward investment in the Venezuelan oil industry is desperately needed. It could be much more effective if it had such investment, and it would then produce more revenues for the people of Venezuela. What President Chavez did was not necessarily helpful.

A lot of comments have been made in this debate about the economy, and it is difficult to know whether it is performing well. With high oil prices, it could do much better. An article in The Economist of 16 February stated:

"Higher prices have quadrupled Venezuela's annual revenue from oil exports since 1998. Nevertheless, the country's Catholic bishops claimed last month that poverty was 'accelerating rapidly'. Not so, replied Mr Chavez. It has 'begun to decrease slowly and progressively'."

So we can choose whom we wish to believe. The article goes on to say:

"In the five years to 2003, Mr. Chavez's performance was disastrous (see chart)."

The chart does tend to indicate that the oil price has gone up, yet poverty has also increased, so there is something slightly wrong there.

"The proportion of households below the poverty line increased by more than 11 percentage points. By 2003, a quarter of Venezuelans were living in 'extreme poverty', unable even to feed themselves adequately. It was the first time since data were collected that poverty rose even as the oil price did too."

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) has described the so-called missions, which are President Chavez's personal missions to engage in emergency health, education and welfare programmes. There are conflicting stories about those programmes, but they certainly are not democratically accountable. They do not appear to be as effective as they might be. Indeed, the article went on to say:

"Whatever the merits of the missions as emergency programmes, they stress quantity over quality. Meanwhile, Venezuela's public infrastructure, such as roads and hospitals, is crumbling. A deficit of 1.5 million housing units is widening. Only a quarter of the 11,000 new houses needed each year are being built, because of the public sector's incompetence and its unwillingness to involve the private sector."

That may well be. I respect The Economist; it is one of the most respected journals for producing balanced articles. It may be that the person who wrote that had a biased view, but there is no doubt in my mind that the Venezuelan economy could perform better.

Another article in The Economist—it might be by the same author; I do not know—on 31 January 2006 stated:

"Fiscal profligacy will keep the public finances in deficit, despite high oil prices."

It continued:

"Most non-oil investment will continue to be put off by the uncertain legal and regulatory regimes and by price and exchange controls . . . The Ministry of Finance has been overborrowing in recent months, and has built up substantial Treasury cash balances".

As has been mentioned, President Chavez has taken on other south American countries' debts. For example, Venezuela has taken on £538 million of Argentine debt. The same pertains to Ecuador.

The President is trying to use the oil wealth to buy influence. That is not unprecedented elsewhere, provided it is done in a benign way. I hope that we can see that it is done in a benign way. We can see from this constructive debate that it is important that south America should be brought to the fore in this Parliament more often and more positively. We have always had good trading relationships with south America and they are, on the whole, friends of ours. We should maintain good trading and diplomatic links, and the debate has been a helpful and positive step. I hope that we can now reach more normal relations after the unfortunate remarks made in past months.

3.42 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): May I say what a pleasure it is to take part in this debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Cook? You have long experience in diplomacy and foreign affairs and I am sure that you have enjoyed this debate as much as I have. It has been a good debate.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon) on securing the debate, which I am answering on behalf of our noble Friend Lord Triesman, who has responsibility for Latin America in the Foreign Office. I welcome the opportunity to discuss Venezuela and the points raised in today's debate. Venezuela is an important country, and I shall try to explain why we believe that. We have heard some of the reasons already. Venezuela is important regionally and globally, which is reflected in the importance we attach to our bilateral relationship with it. That is why the debate is important. It gives us the opportunity to put that on the record. I will come to the points raised by my hon. Friend in a moment, but we have heard a great number of interesting points.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) stressed the importance of the fight against drugs, which I shall deal with in the body of my reply. He is quite right. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) spoke, and I am glad he did, about the eyeball-swivelling right-wingers on the fringes of American politics who assume that they have a divine right to decide how people should vote and that it is possible to react in any way they want to the decision of the democratic expression of the people in south America and Latin America.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) warned us about the scale of the task facing the Venezuelan Government in tackling the dreadful poverty that is evident in the country. It was a good warning. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who has gone now, paid tribute to the women of Venezuela—quite properly, in my view—and listed some of the achievements of the Government in tackling poverty and its social consequences, especially as they affect women. It was important to put that on the record.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) reminded us how important co-operation with Venezuela is, especially in the field of drugs. It is a huge problem. I will try to expand on the subject in a moment. His question about a wider debate about American foreign policy is for another occasion and another venue. I seem to spend half my life dealing with that question, but that is for another place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) gave us an enlightening speech on the historical context, and sketched out some of the reasons why, despite the fact that oil has been around in Venezuela for a long time, it remains a poor country when it ought to be one of the richest in the world, not just in south America. That has ramifications elsewhere as well. My hon. Friend hinted at many reasons why that should be so. He mentioned one that, I think, is the most important. The capacity to govern ought to flow naturally from a democratic election and the decision of the people. If we try to undermine that for partisan reasons, whether they are political, economic or anything else, that is dangerous. That is one of the reasons why Venezuela has for so long had a reputation for instability, when it had democratic elections back in 1947. Since 1958, it has been a reasonably stable democracy by south American standards, although there have been some intervals when that has not been the case. I am glad that my hon. Friend raised that point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) has great experience in these matters. He boiled the importance of the changes that President Chavez and his Government are attempting to implement down to the specific example of a young woman who he met in Venezuela. It is important that we remind ourselves that we are talking not about abstract, high-political notions, but about people and the changes that ought to be happening in such countries. I was glad to hear my hon. Friend do that.

The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) has visited Venezuela and seen it for himself. I cannot see any sign that our business relations with Venezuela have cooled as a consequence of statements that have been made over the past few weeks. I am glad to say that. As I will try to argue, it is an important country for us and for the world.

The hon. Gentleman highlighted some important worries about human rights in Venezuela. It is not pro-American to say that one is worried about human rights in any country. It shows a concern about human rights and about how we promote and protect them. No matter which country we look at, that concern ought to be at the heart of foreign policy in any democracy. That is the case in this country, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised the subject. It is very encouraging that there is a free press in Venezuela as well as vibrant news media that are not afraid to reflect the concerns of people from all parts of society. We must rejoice in that and do our best to protect it.

I was very glad that the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made the speech that he did. I have always been a believer in Gramsci's dictum—I never get it right but I think it is about optimism of the spirit and pessimism of the intellect. It is right that we should cast a sceptical eye across any country when we attempt to analyse where it is likely to move. Of course there are problems in Venezuela, as in many other places. The hon. Gentleman expressed a different view from that of some of my hon. Friends about how those issues, including poverty, might best be addressed, but I respect the fact that he has cast a sceptical eye over the question. I know that he feels passionately that Venezuela and its democratic system should be helped whenever that is possible.

The relationship between the United Kingdom and Venezuela is an active one. We work effectively together in several fields, including crime, counter-narcotics and energy. We have an important commercial relationship, as hon. Members have explained. Indeed, UK companies hold large investments in Venezuela. It is the third biggest market for the United Kingdom in Latin America, and it accounts for almost 10 per cent. of our exports in that area of the world—a figure surpassed, I believe, only by Brazil and Mexico.

We work with the Venezuelan authorities in tackling crime and corruption, which are a major impediment to social and economic development throughout Latin America. Recently we sponsored a conference in Venezuela on the role of the police in Latin America and 14 countries from across the region were represented. The event provided a useful space for debate and for the sharing of experiences from the region on transformation and the restructuring of the police.

Our embassy in Caracas is currently running a project aimed at helping Venezuela to develop its national capacity in the energy sector. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire reminded us that there is a world beyond the most immediate of concerns. One thing that worries me as a former Education Minister is that we do not do enough to export the marvellous skills and abilities of this country's further education sector and universities. They do sterling work that is of relevance in this context. I think that the hon. Member for Cotswold raised the point, and the hon. Member for Hereford certainly did, that the economy could be doing better.

Probably, upskilling—to use that awful term—is the most immediate way to achieve an improvement in that regard. We want the Venezuelan economy to improve. It will help if we can work closely with Venezuela on that: it will promote the transfer of knowledge and skills in several key areas. We have close links with the state oil company in Venezuela and with Venezuelan universities and the appropriate Ministries, as well as other public and private organisations that are involved in providing, supporting and developing education and training to the energy sector in Venezuela. Shell, BP and the Wood group are also making efforts to share their expertise to the benefit of Venezuela, as a reflection of their policies of social responsibility, so that they can work as partners in the development of the country's main natural resources.

Those resources are very extensive. We have heard about only one of them today: oil. However, in fact there are extensive and large deposits of other minerals, such as coal, iron ore, bauxite and gold. The country has remarkable natural resources. It is to be hoped that those resources will help to transform the life of the young woman about whom my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central spoke. If the economy could be tailored to make real use of those minerals, that should and could happen.

I do not know whether we need reminding, but in a world of rapidly depleting resources, Venezuela is a great natural resource for the whole world. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North hinted, it is also a very fertile country. It should have much stronger agriculture, to feed itself and its neighbours, and to enable it to export around the world. My hon. Friend is right to point out that issue. I have talked about the potential for mining precious minerals—coal is a precious mineral these days—but we need to be careful; many agricultural economies have been destroyed by a sudden rush for mineral wealth. We should be able to help the Venezuelans with that issue, and we ought to do it.

As for the vexed question of drugs, under our EU presidency and in co-operation with the Venezuelan authorities—it was good co-operation—we ran the first meeting of drugs observatories of Latin America and the Caribbean and the EU in Caracas. The meeting reaffirmed the principle of shared responsibility, as well as the role that drugs observatories can play in informing the formulation of policies to carry out effective drug strategies.

I shall not have time to expand on that matter as I wanted to, but as we have had greater success against the go-fast boats in the Caribbean that take cocaine to America and the Caribbean islands the drug traffickers have switched their attention. Venezuela is suffering as a consequence of the transhipping of drugs across Venezuela towards Guyana and down to Brazil. The drugs go to the ports in those countries, where they are shipped to west Africa. They then come up through west Africa and into Europe. The people involved are endlessly resourceful. They are well financed. They are having a tremendously corrosive effect in the northern part of south America, and we must work closely with the Venezuelans on that.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the Minister confirm, for the record, that there has been tremendous co-operation from both Cuba and Venezuela in attempts to end the drugs trade in the region and protect the lives of many poor people in Europe and north America?

Dr. Howells: I know that we have co-operated closely with the Venezuelans, and I have a little knowledge about co-operation with Cuba, but I am sure that my hon. Friend, who knows a lot about the subject, is right on that score. It is important. Addiction to crack cocaine and the poison that young people in Europe stick into their veins and up their noses does not just affect communities in Europe, such as his constituency and mine and those of other hon. Members present. It has a corrosive effect also in Venezuela and Colombia.

Tony Lloyd: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that co-operation is vital in this matter, because we shall not resolve the damage that is done in this country without good partners in Latin America. It is also in Venezuela's interest, as it becomes the victim of drug trafficking of the kind that my hon. Friend has described. So does north America, in the end. We all need partnership on those issues, not confrontation.

Dr. Howells: I could not have expressed it better. The problem is a serious one for all of us, and my hon. Friend is right. I am confident that we can work in partnership with Venezuela and other countries in the region. If we do not, we shall all suffer as a consequence.

Mark Pritchard: Is the Minister aware that drug enforcement officers from this country, who currently help in Latin American countries, are being withdrawn because of changes to budgets? If he is not aware of that, will he undertake to investigate the matter and ensure that we put more, not fewer, drugs officers in those countries?

Dr. Howells: I will undertake to give the hon. Gentleman a reply on that. I know that our drugs liaison officers around the world do a superb job, and I shall try to find out about that for him.

In conclusion, I hope that hon. Members will agree that it is in the interests of the United Kingdom to remain engaged with the region. That is why the debate in which my hon. Friend has brought the issue to our attention is so important. What happens in Latin America, including Venezuela, matters a great deal to us all. We shall not always see eye to eye with some its Governments; nor will we shy away from criticism when we judge it to be necessary, but our policy remains to seek constructive engagement with Venezuela. We have much to gain from working together.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. Before we commence the next debate, let me ensure that everyone understands that there is a two-minute discrepancy between the analogue timepiece on the wall and the electronic ones by which we determine our timing.

Judicial Error (Compensation)

4 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): I stray with some trepidation into a discussion of how judicial error is managed and compensated. Although my parents suggested that I pursue the legal profession, I did not do so. I chose otherwise and have only a lay knowledge of the law.

My point of interest in compensation for judicial error stemmed initially from the experience of a constituent, Mr. Paul Robinson, who lives in Netherseal, in the south of my constituency. He was convicted on an indecent assault charge by a 10 to two majority verdict in May 2003. He was sentenced to a two-year community rehabilitation order, ordered to pay prosecution costs and placed on the sex offenders register. His appeal was heard in October 2004. The appeal was allowed and the conviction was quashed. I shall not recount the details of the case. The purpose of this debate is to illustrate the implications of judicial error for my constituent and to ask questions about the implications for the judicial process and the judge in question.

The point at issue that led to the error was that the defence intended to call a witness who had been named by the appellant as having seen her shortly before the claimed offence took place. The defence took the view that if doubt could be cast on her account, a fundamental aspect of her case would fail. The judge, of his own volition and without prompting from the prosecution, indicated that the question went to credit and that the defence was bound by the witness's answer. The defence pursued the point by returning to the witness who could have been called and pointing out the possible evidence that he might give. The prosecution were not called to comment at all during the exchange, at the end of which, as the appeal court put it:

"The judge dealt very peremptorily with the matter. The Crown were not called on for any assistance. He simply said: 'It goes to credit, I am not allowing it, thank you.'"

The appeal court then gave its assessment of the decision:

"It had, in our judgment, become clear, when the judge made this ruling, that it was a key issue in the case whether the complainant had been in Netherseal or Main Street at around 8.30 on the morning of Tuesday 7th May. She said that she went there specifically to talk, among others, to" the possible witness,

"and that he was there. His evidence, had he been allowed to give it, would, as we understand it, have been that he never saw"

the complainant

"at the bus stop at any time during that week."

The appeal court went on to consider legal precedence in the matter. I shall not detain the Chamber by going into that, except to say that, from my reading as a lay person, the outcome seems pretty clear. In giving its judgment, the appeal court put the matter bluntly:

"In our judgment, the evidence of" the potential witness

"in this case did plainly go to an issue in the case, namely, whether the complainant was or was not at the place where the offence is alleged to have occurred at the time that she alleged that it did occur.

[Mr. Mark Todd]

We think the judge was wrong. We think that he was too hasty in reaching the conclusion that he did. He would have been better advised to have sought the assistance of the Crown. In the experience of this Court in doubtful situations such evidence is ordinarily admitted. Be that as it may, the evidence was not admitted in this case and it is our conclusion that, had the evidence been admitted, it is impossible to say that the decision of the jury would inevitably have been the same."

The appeal court then quashed the sentence.

It seems clear that my constituent's conviction was substantially based on the judicial error made. The appeal court did not hear the evidence in question although its content is referred to in the judgment. I wish to pursue two points, the first of which is the consequences for my constituent. His conviction received local publicity, as one would expect. Since then—and even after his successful appeal—he has been subject to harassment both locally and in his business activities. It is fair to say that his life has followed a dramatically altered and inferior course since his conviction. Although he has not spent a period in custody, he has been placed on the sex offenders register and met the required restrictions on his freedoms, which were relieved following the appeal.

My constituent is entitled to no compensation, which relates in part to the presumption that only a prison sentence should prompt compensation and also to the attitude taken to convictions that are shown to be unsafe. There is a reference in one of the cases that I examined to a distinction in some legal minds, according to which "compensation goes only to those ultimately proved innocent, not to all those whose convictions are adjudged unsafe".

That was the conclusion reached in a divisional court in 2002. One can only be grateful that the apparent suggestion that an appellant must prove innocence was overturned at a subsequent appeal, the leading judgment stating that "our criminal system, like that of most other states, does not provide for proof of innocence".

In my constituent's case, the appeal court chose not to hear the evidence that would have cast substantial doubt on the claims of the appellant, relying instead on the argument that the judge had erred. From my brief and inexpert review of other cases in which compensation has been considered, that approach is commonly taken. That appears to leave appellants at a disadvantage in terms of any compensation claim, in that it can seem that their case has succeeded only on technical grounds and not on the basis of evidence demonstrating that facts in the case were otherwise than those heard in court.

We set a very high bar for paying compensation, which is understandable in some respects. As a constituency MP, I sometimes receive angry correspondence about compensation paid when a person is released from prison after a wrongful conviction. That correspondence would be angrier still if compensation were payable when a conviction was overturned on a technicality alone. However, I feel it to be reasonable that, where evidence is available to suggest the probability that the appellant did not commit the offence—as was the case in this instance—it should be heard in addition to any argument over process or judicial error. That did not happen with my constituent.

My other point is about the consequence for the judge. It seems strongly arguable that his decision not to permit a witness to be heard and cross-examined, and for the jury to have made its own judgments on that process, had a material impact on the outcome of the case. It is worth recalling that the jury gave a majority verdict of 10 to two, and that even marginal alterations in the trial process might have made a substantial difference. We are talking about a witness would have questioned the presence of the complainant at the scene.

The straight answer is that I do not know what happened to the judge after his decision was corrected. Although I can appreciate that the objectivity and independence of the judiciary might be harmed by, say, the ability of a complainant to sue the judge for damages where their error causes harm, I would expect some accountability to be exercised for judicial error. On my observation, we instead enter into a polite and largely private world. Some of the texts that I have read, which were written by learned lawyers, point out that it can be argued that the appellate process offers some accountability, in that it demonstrates where a correction is required of a judge. Reversals are normally administered politely and with deference. As one learned commentator has said:

"personal attacks are politely concealed".

In my constituent's case the appeal comment is blunt in those terms.

It might be assumed that adverse appeal judgments were monitored and pursued with the judges involved. Are they, and, if so, how? It is also fair to say that the costs and risks of appeal must mean that only a proportion of cases of judicial error are appraised in that way. Only some cases of judicial error lead to a potential appeal, yet arguably all errors should be monitored and that monitoring should then be reflected in an appraisal of judicial performance.

It has been argued, again by a far more learned person than I, that the price of tolerating incompetent judges should be borne by society in order to protect the competent judges against the abuse of power by the Executive. The argument is essentially that we must put up with failure and error because to have the Executive sacking judges or reprimanding them publicly for their performance would affect their independence of judgment in weighing up particular cases and advising juries. If one accepts the argument that we must accept incompetence, one could reasonably add that the cost to the individual of an incompetent judge should also be borne by society as part of the cost of protecting the judiciary's independence.

There are, it seems, informal processes through which the Bar may pass on informed opinions of judicial performance. However they rely, as much in the legal profession does, on personal networks and exchanges which seem an inadequate means of assessing the performance of those whose actions have a profound bearing on the lives and well-being of individuals.

Public scrutiny is partially offered through the informed and less well-informed comments of the media. Judges are assessed on their performance in that way and are often criticised. That is also presumably monitored to some extent. Among the approaches that are adopted in some cases is the public scrutiny of administrative reports that show the productivity of courts. That is of some informative use, but it does not answer the need for accountability on the quality of judicial performance. It measures only the throughput of courts in getting cases listed and their leading to judgment. It does not address whether the performances have been adequate or not.

It would seem reasonable to have a periodic report that summarised the number of occasions a conviction was overturned in instances where judicial error was found by the higher court to be a contributory factor. Such a report could also set out examples of performance management, such as where judges have been asked to reflect on an adverse superior judgement. I see no reason why an individual should not be named in such a process. In other professions—we are all aware of what happens in the medical profession—acceptance of error and public scrutiny of fault are regarded as perfectly acceptable. Public recognition of error need not impinge on the independence of a judge's future deliberations.

While I have no great hopes that my constituent's experience will lead to any compensation or even to an apology from the judge responsible, I hope to hear from my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister what steps the Government are taking both to monitor and, where necessary, to establish management arrangements for the performance of judges. Failing that, if one accepts that judicial independence is compromised by any attempts to impose competence standards, I hope that we will have a framework for compensating those who suffer a lower barrier to entry than now.

4.14 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on making this case the subject of this debate. It is an individual case, but it raises a number of important and difficult points of principle. I shall deal with our overall approach and then address the mechanisms of accountability and complaint that we have established.

The judiciary in this country are of immense importance. It is down to them to ensure that justice is done, which includes taking away people's property or liberty where that is necessary in the interests of justice. By the same token, they take away people's reputations as part of the process. As a result of the enormously important position that the judiciary hold and their great powers, any errors that they make have far-reaching consequences.

My hon. Friend has given the example of the consequences that resulted from an error for one of his constituents. He also asked whether we should have to choose between the independence of the judiciary and high standards and whether we have to put up with errors and low standards in the judiciary because we just cannot go anywhere near the matter and nothing can be done because taking action would interfere with their independence.

We reject that sense that a choice has to be made. We should ensure that there is both absolute independence of the judiciary—they should be confident of their independence—and high standards. We must have both. We need the judges to be independent, and seen to be such, but we also need a system of redress and accountability for error or misconduct. Just as the judiciary should sustain public confidence, so should the rules about redress and accountability where error or misconduct has taken place.

My hon. Friend is right to say that there is a sense that the systems of complaint get fed into a dark, mysterious, secretive place and nobody knows what view is taken of the complaints or what is done about them. However good a system of complaint is, if it is mysterious and people do not know the outcomes, it will not ensure that public confidence is maintained.

Hitherto, judicial office holders who are criticised by the Court of Appeal have that drawn to their attention, usually through their presiding judge, who will consider whether any further action is necessary by way of giving advice, guidance or refresher training, or by changing their work load. That is not an open process. People will see the criticism in open court but nobody necessarily knows whether it has been drawn to the judge's attention, although it almost certainly will have been. People will not know the presiding judge's view or what action that judge has taken. There is a problem: although action can be taken, it is not seen by those who need to have confidence in the accountability of the judicial system.

My hon. Friend mentioned compensation. Although he is right that his constituent does not qualify for it, perhaps I may explain what the compensation schemes are and how they operate. The Home Office operates two compensation schemes. The first is a statutory scheme under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, which places a duty on the Home Secretary to pay compensation where there are new or newly discovered facts in cases that are out of time for appeal which show beyond reasonable doubt that a miscarriage of justice occurred.

The second scheme is the Home Secretary's discretionary scheme. It applies only when someone has spent time in custody. To that effect, a person might have lost their livelihood and reputation and might feel great outrage, but the discretionary scheme none the less applies only to those who have lost their liberty. It is an ex gratia scheme and there are two bases for it: where there has been serious default by a public authority, which does not include the judiciary because they do not count as a public authority, and where there are exceptional circumstances, such as an accused person being completely exonerated at trial or on appeal. My hon. Friend's constituent would not qualify because, despite the appeal, he did not spend time in custody. Cases of judicial error can only be considered under the Home Secretary's discretionary scheme if someone has spent time in custody.

Mr. Todd: In the first scheme to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred, one of the tests is that new facts that demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that the individual did not commit the offence in question are, effectively, disclosed. In my constituent's case, the Appeal Court could have heard the evidence of the individual who was not called in the original trial, but did not take that opportunity. I understand that it is common practice for the issue of process, if it is available, to dominate as a ground for the dismissal of an appeal, and that often the new evidence that was not heard before is not heard in the Appeal Court.

Ms Harman: I take my hon. Friend's point entirely that if one is exonerated in a quicker and more expedited way, one none the less does not qualify for the section 133 statutory payment. I shall consider that further, particularly as to whether there is a gap such as he has described.

I have explained the discretionary scheme. There is also a provision that the Lord Chancellor has been prepared to consider requests for ex gratia payments in cases in which a judicial office holder has demonstrated some sort of personal misconduct. I want to mention also the new scheme for judicial complaints. In the past, Lord Chancellors have taken seriously cases in which Members of Parliament or members of the public have complained to them about judges, but one problem with that is that it has not been visible. Just as when the Court of Appeal makes a complaint about a judge it might be taken up by the presiding judge, the Lord Chancellor might have taken up such an issue with a judge, but nobody would know about it. That is one issue that the Constitutional Reform Act 2005 was introduced to address, so that while assuring the independence of the judiciary, we bring such complaints out of the polite and private world of the Inns of Court and gentlemen's clubs into proper transparency and accountability.

The reforms in the Act come into effect in April. A major plank of the reforms is the introduction of a statutory regime governing the investigation of allegations of judges' personal misconduct. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice will have joint responsibility for the scheme and for a new office of judicial complaints, which will be operational from 3 April. The office will support them in that new role and regarding the introduction of proper rules and regulations. Any regulations will be laid before Parliament so that, as with any other important system, one can see what the rules are and which bodies will apply them.

Mr. Todd: My right hon. and learned Friend refers to misconduct; there is a distinction between misconduct and error. In the case that I discussed, no one suggested that the judge did something indecent or improper, but simply that he made a mistake. How would that be handled in the process?

Ms Harman: Judicial error is dealt with through appeals and the compensation scheme that I outlined. I will consider further what my hon. Friend said on that.

As my hon. Friend rightly points out, I am dealing with misconduct here, and the sorts of related issues about which people might complain, which are not necessarily described as errors, but are generally about people wanting to complain about the judiciary. I am talking about cases concerning matters that cannot be subject to appeal, but about which people feel aggrieved and want to make complaints. Hitherto, there was no proper process for such situations, but there will now be such a process under the Constitutional Reform Act. I was just taking the opportunity that my hon. Friend has created with this debate to remind hon. Members how the system will work, because it is all part of trying to ensure that we do not have to choose between independence and high standards or accountability; we want to have them all.

In addition to the new office of judicial complaints, there will be a judicial appointments and conduct ombudsman to oversee its operation. There will be a lay element to the consideration of any individual complaint. I remind hon. Members that Sir John Brigstocke was recently appointed to the ombudsman position; I am looking forward to meeting him tomorrow.

The reforms will ensure that we all understand that the judiciary are independent but that they live in a world in which people expect accountability and redress, and that people are less likely simply to assume that the right thing was done. "Leave it with me" is no longer good enough. If people think that something has gone wrong, they want it put right. That is part of the welcome change of people expecting public authorities to do the right thing and be accountable if they do not.

The winds of change that the new office of judicial complaints will bring into the judiciary will have a beneficial effect beyond even the question of personal misconduct. We do not want judges always to have to look over their shoulders, but we all know that if we might be answerable for something, we think about it with extra care. We want judges to be fearlessly independent but to have a sense of accountability, not just through the appeal process, but through a process that involves lay people and not just the courts.

I might not have been able to deal with my hon. Friend's constituent's sense of grievance, but I undertake to ensure that the Lord Chancellor sees the report of these proceedings and understands my hon. Friend's concerns. I shall also bring the issue to the attention of Sir John Brigstocke when I meet him tomorrow. There is a line of thought that colleagues should not even mention individual cases as it is all down to the judge and nobody should mention such cases in the House of Commons, but I do not agree. This is absolutely an appropriate subject for debate, and we might have to make an alteration if we find that my hon. Friend has identified a lacuna.

Defence Procurement

4.28 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I am delighted to initiate the debate, not least because, as the Member of Parliament for Bridgwater for the past five years, I have lived with the threat of the closure of the ammunition plant.

Defence is a genuine interest of mine. I used to be an adviser to the Land Command, and I retain the rank of major in the Fusiliers and remain on the reserve list. Most importantly, I represent a constituency with a proud history of providing weapons and arms to the Army, Navy and Air Force—providing them with real means to do the job.

In Bridgwater, to put it crudely, we make bombs. We have done so efficiently, economically and successfully for more than 50 years—in fact, for just on 60 years. Most of my constituents who are involved at the plant are the best legal bomb makers in the business. They are true specialists and, needless to say, dedicated to their work. But next year, there may be no more work for them to do. Next year, the people who own the Royal Ordnance factory, as it used to be called, outside Puriton, intend to close the place. They reckon that they can buy what Britain needs elsewhere in the world, and cheaper. I think that they are misguided, and I am not alone by any means: 135 skilled people agree with me, and so does my parliamentary predecessor, Lord King of Bridgwater, who was Defence Secretary at the time of the first Gulf war and has an exemplary record with this country's armed forces, having also served as a young serviceman.

To shut the plant would be much more than a local blow; it would be a national disgrace. If taken to its logical conclusion, it could put the defence of the realm at risk. Even local people in an industrial town such as Bridgwater feel a sense of betrayal. We started making armaments in Bridgwater during the last war. It was a question of genuine necessity. Germany was stretching our military capabilities to the limits, so building the factory had to start as quickly as possible. At that time, of course, money was no object. They even dug a complete canal system from the Bristol channel to provide the water for the factory.

Over the years, that discrete little plant of 400 acres has churned out the propellant, bombs, missiles and everything else that we have needed for every theatre of conflict in which the United Kingdom has taken part since the second world war. It was the local Royal Ordnance factory that made the famous bouncing bomb. Its inventor, Sir Barnes Wallis, would probably be rotating in his grave if he realised what was going to happen to the factory that played such an important part in our history.

The bombs that came down on Saddam Hussein's bunkers were primed at Puriton. The final charges for many of our weapons of mass destruction are made and located in Bridgwater. The work force remain and will always remain special. Originally, they were recruited from throughout Britain, and they are people who do a very dangerous and vital job of keeping our defences on the straight and narrow.

The factory also maintains an exemplary safety record. Rarely has there been a problem, and no problem has ever involved an explosion. When the factory became a part of BAE Systems, and that did not happen under the present Government, there was a change—there was a can-do attitude. Even when the plant was under threat of closure two years ago, the entire work force volunteered for extra productivity to keep the plant going for BAE Systems. They went on to three shifts a couple of years ago, for obvious reasons. I know that because I have been working alongside the trade unions since I have been in Parliament, and the local management is also determined to try to keep the factory open.

I am afraid that crude economies are beating common sense into second place. BAE Systems is rationalising, rightly, for hard commercial reasons, but no Government should treat the defence of the country as a commercial venture, and no Government should ever be held hostage by any company, especially one such as BAE Systems. Let us consider the matter crudely: who will pack the bombs, load the bullets and enable the military to do the job that we all depend on it to do? Those are sensible questions to which as yet we have had no forthright answers. I have been in correspondence with Ministers, and Lord King of Bridgwater and I have had face to face meetings with Lord Drayson on this subject. However, I am told time and again that the decision has been made and the security of supply is safe. The official line is that there is nothing to worry about. BAE Systems is confident. In the manner of Mandy Rice-Davies, they would say that, wouldn't they? BAE Systems probably cannot be bothered with a little bomb factory that ticks over nicely but will never make a real bomb in the financial sense.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I should declare an interest. As a serving bomb disposal officer in the Territorial Army, I am especially keen on bombs. My hon. Friend is making a powerful case about appropriate sovereignty in our defence procurement systems. Indeed, this area is covered by the defence industrial strategy, which I realise is not in the direct realm of the Minister. Does my hon. Friend share my concern that it is not just the factory in his constituency but also the small and medium-sized enterprises that serve it that could be affected?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I thank my hon. Friend for that thoughtful intervention. I agree totally, and I defer to him in the area of bomb disposal. It is not one in which I personally would ever get involved.

I realise that it is not this Minister but Lord Drayson who deals directly with this subject. In the meeting that I had with the noble Lord, I was not utterly convinced that he had grasped the complexities of the situation in respect of the defence of the realm. He understood the financial side, but, on the practical side, I was not entirely sure that he understood the long-term ramifications.

I totally agree with my hon. Friend. Many of the companies that supply directly to the plants are British companies. After they go, I wonder where defence supplies will be obtained. There have been many questions in the House on this issue.

[Mr. Liddell-Grainger]

The land on which the factory stands is close to the M5. I suspect that it would fetch a large packet for housing. I wonder if that has crept into the BAE accountants' heads. I rather hope not, but I have a horrible feeling that I may be wrong.

National security should never depend on commercial interests. I am told, for example, that the United States navy is seriously worried about future supplies, as the Puriton factory provides a type of explosive that is hard to obtain from any other source. Rumour has it that the Pentagon is trying to persuade my local plant to make more of the stuff so that the American military can stockpile it. The Americans are well aware of the skills of the British work force and certainly have no intention of shopping around the world, unlike us.

Naturally, one can buy things that go bang from all corners of the globe, but the secret is to buy quality. One certainly does not want things going bang unexpectedly—that would be completely unacceptable and, of course, dangerous to those in my hon. Friend's line—or failing to go bang when they should.

A few years ago, the British military tried to save cash by buying bullets from the far east, specifically India. But riflemen with rifles that refuse to fire are no good to any army. The foreign goods were quietly and, unfortunately, expensively scrapped. The factory in Bridgwater made up the difference in supplies, at some cost to itself.

I have an abiding distrust of the defence procurement process. For example, how did the highly trained experts responsible for RAF Yeovilton, which is in Somerset, manage to order an expensive new control tower which, when built, did not give views of the aircraft?

Those of us with contacts in the military well remember Operation Sharp Sword. It was a huge training exercise in the Gulf before the action started. Unfortunately, things went wrong. The boots melted—I have some experience of that myself, it is not a new thing—and tanks and helicopters were instantly clogged up with sand. How many times have vehicles been taken to desert situations and refitted in theatre, instead of before they leave this country? The lads on the ground renamed the exercise Operation Broken Penknife, which is hardly inspiring when one is talking about the defence of the realm and putting the lives of our troops at risk.

Rumour also has it that France could be the new source of some of these supplies. The French make splendid cheese and wine, but I would not bank on their ability to keep us in weapons or explosives. The French record on safety and security trails a long way behind ours. I am told that a consignment of explosives was recently shipped from France to Somerset so that the experts at Puriton could have a good look at it—could evaluate it on our behalf. The product was passable, but the security at the French depot where it was collected was non-existent: the lorry driver drove in and picked it up and no one was there. No wonder the Americans are twitchy. But we should be twitchy, too. This is no time for complacency.

Somerset has the only ordnance plant that makes propellant. It is now facing closure because of the peace dividend. Everybody hoped that we would not grumble, but this sad saga is really about price, not peace. I believe that making weapons is far too important to leave to the marketplace; that has been proved to be the case on many occasions. Closing our arms factory would obviously be a bitter blow to Bridgwater, but it would also be a dangerous step for our national security. I appeal to the Minister to intervene—to use his muscle—before it is too late.

Even when the Prime Minister was questioned on this topic during Question Time, he said that he was happy that the security of supply and the assurances given by BAE Systems were sufficient. They are only sufficient until something goes wrong. When it goes wrong, the blame will sit squarely on the shoulders of the Government of the day—that may not be this Government or its Ministers—for allowing this to happen in the first place.

4.42 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) on securing this debate and on providing me with the opportunity to speak on these important issues. I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's expertise and his involvement—the role he has played in Her Majesty's armed forces. I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) on the role he has played.

As the hon. Member for Bridgwater will be aware, we discussed procurement generally in depth in a defence debate on 2 February. We largely dealt with the recently published defence industrial strategy—the DIS—and the progress we were making on our major programmes. That, of course, affects the way procurement in this country is managed and run in the future. The hon. Gentleman raised a number of issues and some of them fall within the ambit of the DIS, so I think it is worth setting that out again. He has made some trenchant criticisms of past procurement, and many of the points he made have been taken on board by the present Government. We have learned lessons and we are trying to put in place a new construct to assist us. If I briefly touch on the DIS, I hope that it will give the hon. Gentleman comfort in respect of some of the areas of tangential concern that he raised.

We published the DIS on 15 December. It has been well received across industry and by the trade unions. There has been a general welcome for it in this House and the other place, recognising the new partnership between industry and the Government on which it is based. The DIS gives industry, for the first time, real clarity on what we require, how we will go about obtaining that and how we can maintain onshore those elements of industry that are fundamental to our national security. In some sectors, the market is healthily competitive; in others, such as maritime and guided weapons, change is unquestionably required. Industry must make its commercial decisions in responding to the DIS, but we expect companies to show leadership by aligning their businesses to the realities of the future.

Maintaining the ability to support and upgrade the significant programme of new platforms and new equipment that we are bringing into service will be crucial. We clearly cannot afford a cradle-to-grave industry in all sectors. However, the higher-value areas—those that provide the most secure and interesting careers—are often the very ones in which we need to keep our freedom of military action.

We have taken the bold step of setting out the realities, which many would say is long overdue, and we have done so early enough for companies to be able to plan for the transition to a sustainable future while they are well employed. It was John F. Kennedy who said, "The time to fix the roof is when the sun is shining." I am pleased to report that industry and the Ministry of Defence are wasting no time in implementing the DIS.

I think the hon. Member for Bridgwater was seeking to claim the moral high ground and to call into question perhaps not the integrity but the capacity of BAE Systems. May I remind him of some of the history? The royal ordnance factories were vested as Royal Ordnance plc on 2 January 1985, and a major transition took place at that time. BAE Systems took it over in 1987. It is worth bearing it in mind that there have been closures of significant parts of that enterprise over the years. To mention just a few, Enfield closed in 1988; Patricroft closed in 1989, as did Waltham Abbey; and Westcott closed in 1994. That was well before the time of this Administration and well before my time.

Was the realm threatened as a consequence? No, it was not. Why was that action required? To answer that, I would have to examine some of the issues, but there was probably a need for rationalisation, a better way of delivering what needed to be delivered. The then Conservative Government understood that that had to be examined and tested, and the decisions were taken. The very fact of closure is no sign of disrespect to those who have shown commitment and delivered a high-quality service in years past. Sometimes, closure is needed to ensure the best delivery. Much of what we are doing now involves taking the same factors into account. We are, of course, doing much more besides.

The defence industrial strategy provided clarity on the MOD's thinking in a variety of sectors, including general munitions. In it, we recognised explicitly the military importance of general munitions. I do not believe that there is any difference between us on that. Paragraph B6.3 on page 95 states that "quality general munitions, including Small Arms Ammunition, are essential to provide the volumes of fire and the 24 hour, all weather capability required to suppress, neutralise and demoralise enemy forces".

The hon. Gentleman knows better than I do what that means in practice.

The chapter outlined critical capabilities that we want to retain and develop in the industrial base, which included the manufacture of certain munitions—not all but particularly insensitive munitions and polymer bonded explosives to ensure that the safety hazards inherent in those weapons are as low as is reasonably practicable. We consulted industry throughout the process.

The hon. Gentleman will know that BAE Systems provides us with the majority—80 per cent. of repeat buys—of our general munitions capability under a long-term framework partnering agreement dating back to 1999. The FPA has provided us with security of supply and contributed to the delivery of an effective general munitions capability that has stood the test of numerous operations since its inception. However, given the particular importance of munitions to our overall military capability, this is an area where we cannot afford to stand still, and we are continually reviewing how best to ensure security of supply—that is uppermost in our mind—and the best value for money for the taxpayer. That is no different from the situation in all those years past when the general munitions environment was undergoing such radical change.

As part of that ongoing work and coincident with the DIS work, we reaffirmed last September our long-term requirement for general munitions and signed a partnering principles agreement with BAE Systems setting out how we might work together in the future. That was informed by our DIS capability assessments. We set out the assessments and then talked to industry to ascertain whether we could apply that partnering arrangement, which applies to general munitions, consistently across a range of platform and other equipment deliveries.

As a consequence of those decisions, BAE Systems made commercial decisions involving the closure of two of its munitions sites at Chorley and Bridgwater—Bridgwater, obviously, being the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I can well understand his concern about the Bridgwater site, but I should point out that this is a commercial decision for the company as it responds to the wider market place and the DIS, and considers what is best for defence as a whole.

I should make it absolutely clear that we have taken steps to ensure that our military capability will not be weakened by this process. We have worked hard with the company and received the assurances that we need about safeguarding the supply of material, which will no longer be directly provided by BAE Systems as a result of its decisions. So we have put all that under test, using the same criteria as were laid down by the hon. Gentleman. The company wrote to the Defence Committee on 13 February this year, elaborating in detail on the safeguards that we have jointly agreed. No doubt that will be given due weight by the Committee when it reports.

As part of the guarantee, BAE Systems is establishing a strategic stockpile of Bridgwater-produced material to support our forces for the foreseeable future. That is an important aspect; as well as taking the assurances and guarantees, we also have a stockpile so that we can sustain our needs into the foreseeable future. The company also discussed with us how it will undertake its assessments when sourcing material from overseas, and made it clear that secure sources of supply will be a key factor in any decisions. We strongly support the company's efforts to raise efficiency across its business in general and, in particular, to create a sustainable future for general munitions production in the UK, while ensuring value for money for the taxpayer.

The partnering principles also give the opportunity to improve the delivery of military capability to the armed forces. The BAE Systems site at Glascoed in south Wales will become a centre of excellence in the development of insensitive munitions materials such as PBX, which I mentioned earlier. There will be considerable investment at the Glascoed site to allow that to take place. It is not as if we are throwing everything out; indeed, we are satisfied that the company has taken rational decisions, and it is also investing in key capabilities.

The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the Department is also in partnering arrangements with other munitions suppliers such as Wallop Defence Systems, based in the UK, and Rheinmetall AG, based in Germany. To sum up on the issue of munitions: our work in this area will provide better capability at better value for money in this important sector.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I thank the Minister for his generosity and am intrigued by what he has said. He knows better than anybody in the Chamber that the stress of going into action and supplying the equipment—getting it to the right place at the right time—is phenomenal.

During the first Gulf war, the noble Lord King, the then Defence Secretary, was told by the Belgians that they would not supply machine gun ammunition. If that happens in such a situation, there is a problem. If we depend on the French or South Africans or Americans and they say, "No, we do not want to do this", ammunition will be the first thing to run out. It is the thing that is most prolifically used—bombs, missiles, the lot. The assurance given by the Minister and the noble Lord Drayson is fine as far as it goes, but there is no guarantee at the end of the day that the country involved would allow us to have the stuff if it disagreed on moral grounds with what the British Government of the day were doing.

Mr. Ingram: I well recognise that point, and I make this one. We work within a set of relationships, whether NATO or EU relationships. There is a greater amount of interdependency and there are greater efforts, improving the success levels of interoperability. All those things must now take place, because no one nation can effectively deliver all the capabilities that they need. Even the United States, during the Afghan conflict, had to call on NATO's airborne warning and control systems. Indeed, it was German planes that flew over the US skies because the US's surveillance aircraft were—correctly—heavily engaged in tracking down the evil force that attacked it on 9/11. I well understand that.

The hard logic of what the hon. Gentleman is saying is that we should produce everything ourselves; we should be producing all stocks and all our equipment, and there should be no purchasing from abroad. It is not just a question of ammunition—and there is no question at all about how vital ammunition is. A spare that keeps a helicopter flying, or any nuts and bolts that could be critical to mission success, could fall into the same category, although they do not have the same immediacy for infantry in the front line. However, to someone flying an aircraft, such parts can still be as important, in terms of getting it wrong. That is perhaps a weakness in what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I am not denying the importance of ensuring security of supply; that is vital.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we already have the stocks necessary to meet the defence planning assumptions. To sum up in one phrase, we could go to war now. We do not need to wait for those in the supply chain to say that they can supply. That has been proven consistently. I recognise some of the issues that have been raised in the past, and that is why we go through training exercises. I have been a Defence Minister for four and a half years now. I remember the Saif Sareea 2 training exercise, which took place at the same time as the conflict in Afghanistan. The debate was whether we should go ahead with that exercise. The decision was taken do so, although it put a considerable strain on the system, because we had valuable lessons to learn, and those lessons were absolutely critical. The exercise did expose issues within the defence logistics organisation. We have taken on board those critical lessons and we are now moving forward. General munitions fall within that area. I am sorry that the commercial decisions have impacted adversely on the hon. Gentleman's constituency and I am sorry for the people who work in that factory, but at the end of the day I do not think for a moment that the defence of the realm is threatened by what we are seeking to do.

Violence Against Women

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Quite a number of hon. Members wish to speak in this debate. If everyone keeps their comments as succinct as possible, we might be able to call all of them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I first want to remark on the significance of the fact that this debate is taking place. The innovation of having a debate to mark international women's day was made following the 1997 election. That is a mark of the importance that we attach to equality.

I am glad that we are focusing on violence against women today. That is why in the Chamber we have two Ministers for the price of one. My Department, the Home Office, is the Department responsible for violent crime, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality will conclude the debate. That signals that this is not just an issue for women, but an issue of crime and violence that we need to address.

It is a shocking fact that, globally, domestic violence is the leading cause of morbidity in women between the ages of 19 and 44. It is also shocking that 30 per cent. of pregnant women in the United Kingdom have experienced domestic violence while pregnant. Women are significantly more likely than men to experience physical or sexual violence. Although I acknowledge that men and same-sex couples may also experience domestic violence and/or sexual assault, we must not forget that in this country a woman is killed every two or three days as a result of domestic violence. This is a crucial issue of crime.

Those statistics illustrate the barriers to achieving our objective of equality. The low social and economic position of women can be a consequence of the violence that they experience, but it can also provide a context within which that violence can thrive, forcing women and girls into a subordinate position. Violence against women is much more likely than violence against men to take place in the home—the place where we all want to feel safe from fear.

I have the privilege of being the Minister with responsibility for victims. In this area of violent crime more than any other the victim may end up blaming themselves—feeling that somehow their action contributed to the violence against them. That is completely unacceptable. Only one person is responsible for violent crime, and that is the perpetrator of that violent crime. If only one message goes out from today's debate and that message is that that is what the whole House believes, it will be very important for both the perpetrators and the victims of violence.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I wish to confirm that the Minister is right. Conservative Members agree with what she has just said.

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank the hon. Lady.

We have designated this month as domestic violence month, illustrating the Government's commitment to tackling that crime, which devastates families and erodes communities. We condemn all forms of violence against women—domestic violence, sexual violence and trafficking and prostitution.

I asked for a record of the milestones of achievement over the past 30 years. I shall not read them out because I can see how many Members wish to speak and it might be regarded as complacence, but such a list would mention legislation, intervention and protection; ensuring that police officers, Crown prosecutors, probation officers and people who work with victims are better prepared; and ensuring that other areas of service are better prepared, such as health services so that, for example, accident and emergency departments are able not only to provide care for victims but to do so in a way that protects forensic evidence. We have also established advocacy and support services, which are vital in the early stage of contact with victims. They should be available to victims before, during and after court processes. In that context, I recognise the success of specialist domestic violence courts pilots and of the introduction of independent domestic violence advisers, who have demonstrated successful outcomes in bringing perpetrators to justice—too many perpetrators are still not brought to justice—providing support to victims, and improving the entire criminal justice pathway.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): Given that we know that more than half—57 per cent.—of victims of domestic violence are involved in more than one incident and that women are on average beaten more than 30 times before they go to the police, does my hon. Friend agree that we still have a long way to go in persuading women that any type of violence in the home is totally and utterly unacceptable?

Fiona Mactaggart: Absolutely, but we ought also to persuade the men who are being violent.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Is not one of our biggest tasks to get the message out to men that violence is unacceptable? I was horrified to read a survey that showed that 75 per cent. of 11 to 12-year-old boys thought that women should get hit if they make men angry. We must get into schools and help young people to understand that that sort of attitude is unacceptable.

I remember being involved in a court case when I was a social worker where the judge was cross-examining the man, and he said to him, "You're saying that Mrs. Moon is lying when she says that you are violent towards your wife?" The man replied, "That's right, I'm never violent." The judge said, "Can I be clear; you have never hit your wife?" The man said, "Well, I give her the odd backhand to keep her in line, but I'm never violent." That understanding of what violence means—that violence somehow does not include the odd backhander to keep wives in line— is sometimes the gap that we have to cross. We must make it clear that that crosses the line of what is unacceptable.

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. One of our innovations is work with perpetrators. In the probation service in 2005, we established an accredited perpetrator programme. There is some debate about how well it works, but research in the United States and our country seems to show that it reduces the likelihood of reoffending. That is one issue, but my hon. Friend's point about educating young people about violence and about intervening before such incidents occur is also very important.

Across Government, we have the rape action plan, the national domestic violence plan, and we have established sexual assault referral centres and domestic violence specialist courts, which are now in existence in every region of England and Wales.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): That is an impressive list of achievements, and I agree entirely that men need to be engaged in the issue. However, does my hon. Friend agree that the push to get domestic violence on to the agenda received a huge boost when large numbers of Labour women were elected to Parliament in 1997? Prior to that there were all-party groups on beer, cider, Scotch whisky, probably Irish whiskey as well and every Indian ocean island to which a free trip could be got, but there was not one on domestic violence. Does my hon. Friend agree that that was a great step forward?

Fiona Mactaggart: I agree absolutely. I think that when the voices of women are normal in politics, politics changes, and not only in the sort of field that we are discussing. I remember doing research on how women had changed Parliament, and one aspect of that was that when we talked about the Army, we stopped talking only about the size of their bombs and the number of regiments, and started to talk about their wives and children and what happened to them. Women think about politics differently, and, when we talk about violent crime, one of the aspects of violence to which we are more alert—one that leads, as I pointed out, to two murders a week—is domestic violence and violence against women.

It is a reflection of women's greater engagement in Parliament that one of the most recent items in a slew of legislation is the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004. Later this month we shall publish the second national report and the comprehensive delivery plan outlining how we shall improve help for victims and ensure that they come forward in the certainty of getting the help, protection and support that they need. We also have assistance programmes in relation to the domestic violence that affects people in black and minority ethnic communities.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that women need allies among politicians, religious leaders and health professionals. I wonder whether she is aware that later this year the Council of Europe, to which I am a delegate, is to launch a pan-European campaign against violence against women, including domestic violence. The Council is looking for a venue for a conference to launch that campaign. Will she communicate with the Council of Europe to ascertain whether it is possible to offer the United Kingdom Parliament as the venue for such a conference?

Fiona Mactaggart: That is the other thing that women do in politics—they use opportunities to make quick bids, and more power to my hon. Friend's elbow. I shall pass that suggestion on to colleagues.

Britain has collaborated very effectively in Europe, such as in the work that we did with Turkey, on people trafficking and related issues. These are significant issues and we are making progress. We have established a proactive and multifaceted strategy on trafficking in human beings, including legislation, prosecution, law enforcement, provision of appropriate care and support for victims and national and international co-operation.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Fiona Mactaggart: I really want hon. Members to have the opportunity to make speeches. I shall give way again, but I shall start to resist interventions.

Jo Swinson: On the point about trafficking, what is the Minister's view on the UK's not yet having signed the European convention on action against trafficking in human beings? It is an important step that we should take to give the women in that position the support that they need at a vulnerable time.

Fiona Mactaggart: As the hon. Lady knows, there are some minor technical difficulties about the consequences of the period of rest and reflection. However, we believe absolutely in leadership on a cross-Europe basis. We led on the recently adopted European Union action plan, which will enable us, with our international partners in source countries, transit countries and other destination countries like ours to intervene effectively at each key stage of the trafficking process, to protect women who are being exploited, and, most importantly, to bring to justice the criminal gangs who do it.

We are already seeing the fruits of those actions in the conviction of several members of organised criminal gangs and their sentencing to lengthy prison terms. We are working directly in partnership with the voluntary sector to support and protect victims who are trafficked for sexual exploitation through prostitution. The Government-funded Poppy scheme has successfully supported more than 100 victims since 2003. We are engaging actively with key non-governmental organisations as we develop our strategy further.

We recently conducted a wide public consultation exercise on another form of violence against women: prostitution. Views were sought from a wide range of individuals and organisations, including women victims of sexual exploitation, as the basis for the development of a co-ordinated strategy on prostitution. That should lead to a more proactive and comprehensive response from local partnerships to address street prostitution and all forms of commercial sexual exploitation.

The risk of being a victim of violent crime and the barriers to the successful prosecution of those who commit rape and other serious offences are magnified enormously for those who are involved in prostitution. They share with many women the feelings of shame and self-blame, but those feelings are exacerbated by a lack of self-esteem and the common view that it is only what they should expect.

Prostitution is a dangerous occupation and the best way to protect women is to challenge its existence and deal with the factors that cause them to be involved in prostitution in the first place. That is what our strategy does. It establishes effective measures to protect young people from those who would use and abuse them through prostitution. It provides help and support to women involved in prostitution, to enable them to find a way off the street. It also makes it clear that we will not tolerate those who control prostitution—that is why we have imposed 14-year sentences for brothel-keeping and controlling a prostitute—and those who create the demand for it in the first place.

It will take time to end all forms of commercial sexual exploitation and as we work towards that end we have a duty to women in prostitution to keep them as safe as they can be. We cannot make theirs a safe profession, and in some ways that should not be the goal of our policy, but we can reduce the risk of violence. That is why we are planning to redefine a brothel, so that a woman can work with a maid, or two women can work together, rather than alone. It is a matter of helping women to protect themselves from violent and sexual assault. An important part of protecting them is the sharing of information on what they call "dodgy punters" through ugly mugs schemes. We are building on those successful schemes by encouraging the making of reports to Crimestoppers and ensuring that important information is fed back to those on the street.

Many women are, initially at least, reluctant to report violent crime. We funded an initiative to explore ways in which voluntary organisations providing support to women in prostitution can encourage them to report such crime by providing an advocacy service. It is not only women in prostitution who are reluctant to report matters: other women are similarly reluctant, because of the victimising effect of prosecutions in many such cases. We need to use advocacy and victim support as a normal part of the operation of justice.

Violence perpetrated against women often affects silent victims: their children. Witnessing domestic violence can have a profoundly negative effect on a child's emotional and physical well-being, which, in turn, can negatively affect their educational attainment and social interaction. That has a substantial effect on society as a whole. I commend to hon. Members the statement that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary issued yesterday on the work of the Home Office on international women's day.

Underpinning our concern about violence against women are the consequences for the criminal justice system as a whole. About half of women in prison have experienced violence repeatedly in at least one relationship. That is a stark reminder of why early intervention and prevention is so crucial. It is the first key objective of the national domestic violence strategy.

I know that many hon. Members want to speak and I shall bring my remarks to an end, but I should like to end by saying that what I have outlined is not just about the work of the Government; it is about work in partnership, and not only our partnership with the voluntary sector—the sector that provides refuges, advocacy and support to women. It is about the whole of civil society. Domestic violence costs our economy about £23 billion a year. I have been struck in recent months by the degree to which business, for example, realises that violence against women is a business cost—about £2.3 billion of the overall cost is borne by businesses. Getting businesses to work in collaboration with Government to protect their employees and ensure that their human resources departments deal with the effects of violence is part of providing a civilised society—one in which women can be free from fear. Every citizen, but particularly women, should be free from fear. We are moving down that road, but there is more to do. We should be proud of what we have achieved, but we should be determined to achieve more.

Several hon. Members rose—

The Chairman: Order. I repeat my request for brief speeches. A large number of Members want to speak, and it will be difficult to accommodate everybody. The winding-up speeches will start at about 5 o'clock.

2.50 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I shall be brief because many Members want to speak. I shall address one specific aspect of violence against women—the sex slave trade, or as The Sunday Telegraph more graphically put it, "The plight of the cellar girls".

The issue is important nationally, but also in my area of Northamptonshire. A prostitute wrote to me not about prostitution—I shall not go down that route—but about the forced slavery of young women, particularly from eastern Europe. Let me read briefly from a BBC report:

"On 31 October 2004, a 16-year-old Lithuanian girl made what was probably the biggest mistake of her young life when she agreed to go on a trip to the UK with a group of new friends.

Instead of the few days of fun she had been promised, she ended up being sold into prostitution in an ordeal that was to last for months."

I should say that this is a success story, because the police broke the ring up. Things are much worse for other girls.

The girl was tricked into leaving home by a young man who she thought was a friend. The article continues:

"He introduced her to a group of his 'friends' in a nightclub, who invited her to join them on an exciting 'sports' trip to London, all expenses paid.

After forging a permission letter from her parents, the men took her to Sheffield and handed her over to a gang who took her ID ... which clearly showed she was only 16 ... They told her she would have to work as a prostitute to cover the money they had paid for her and took her to a house in ... Hounslow—one of a string of brothels in ... London ... Under the working name

[Mr. Peter Bone]

'Veronica from Italy', she was forced to sleep with as many as 10 men a day and earning her pimps around £800 a day—of which she received nothing, despite being promised a share."

During the prosecution, the court was told:

"The gang gave the girls little or no money and kept them in the brothels mainly through fear, occasionally selling them on to other traffickers 'like cattle'".

Is it not disgraceful that, 200 years after we abolished slavery, this form of slavery is still going on? The Minister said that there were technical reasons why the Government will not sign the European convention on action against trafficking in human beings. Whatever those reasons are, they should be overcome quickly because this trade is disgraceful.

When such young women are discovered in this country, their fear of having to return home is a real issue, and I hope that the Government will tackle that. I would also like them to consider tougher border controls for young women coming into this country. Action on those two points would at least help to reduce this disgusting and outrageous trade.

2.53 pm

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): Since March 1975, 8 March has been celebrated as international women's day. It is celebrated throughout the world at local and national levels. This year, the theme is "Women in Decision-Making: Meeting Challenges, Creating Changes". As the Beijing declaration tells us:

"Women's empowerment and their full participation on the basis of equality in all spheres of life, including participation in the decision-making process and access to power, are fundamental for the achievement of equality, development and peace".

The international community is beginning to understand the fundamental principle that women are just as affected as any man by the challenges facing humanity in the 21st century in terms of economic and social development, peace and security; indeed, women are often more affected by them. It is therefore necessary that women should be engaged in equal strength and equal numbers in all areas of decision making. The world has also begun to realise that the most effective policy to promote development, health and education is the empowerment of women and girls. Furthermore, no policy is more important in preventing conflict or achieving post-conflict reconciliation.

At the 2005 world summit, world leaders declared that "progress for women is progress for all".

The summit outcome called for universal access to sexual and reproductive health to be integrated into strategies for achieving millennium development goals and as a means to promote gender equality and women's empowerment. Four issues were of particular concern: sexual violence in conflict areas, human trafficking, honour killings and female genital mutilation.

The UN declaration on the elimination of violence against women defines violence against women thus:

"Any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women".

Gender-based violence often begins at an early age. Female infanticide is still practised in societies where male children are valued economically and socially above girls. Medical testing for sex selection has become a business in some countries; indeed, it is currently being debated in the United Kingdom. During childhood, preferential allocation of precious family resources to male children might impact negatively on the health of girls. Those resources might include food, medical care and schooling.

Domestic violence is the most common form of gender-based violence. As girls enter marriage, domestic violence might become a problem. They often enter marriage as adolescents and, in some instances, without giving consent. Domestic violence might become a very big problem where the husband is considerably older than his wife and where local custom recognises the husband as the dominant partner.

Violence against women also occurs in situations where women are unable to exercise their right to fair treatment. Such situations include the sexual exploitation of women refugees, use of rape as a weapon of war and the trafficking of women for sex work. As a weapon of war, children and women are sexually assaulted by soldiers, police, militias and others who take advantage of the climate of lawlessness and impunity that often prevails in armed conflicts. Women and girls who have been raped sustain serious injuries and psychological trauma as a result of the violence that they have endured. Usually, they have few means of seeking justice, medical care or social support. According to Human Rights Watch, tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of women and girls have been raped in the past five years of conflict in the Congo. That rape is increasingly characterised by extremely savage and brutal violence, and includes gang rape, rape with objects and cannibalism.

Recent wars in Bosnia, Croatia and Rwanda have seen the use of forced pregnancy as a form of ethnic cleansing—another weapon of war with long-lasting consequences for women and for the babies that are conceived in that way. Women might be shunned by their husbands and families and be forced to raise on their own the children who have been conceived as a result of rape. The children themselves might be stigmatised and seen as children of the enemy; they might experience neglect, denial of resources or even infanticide.

Many soldiers appear to feel that committing rape or other acts of sexual violence against civilian women and children is acceptable behaviour in a war situation. Numerous international observers have reported a systematic campaign to use rape to spread devastation and humiliation in the Darfur region of Sudan. Women and girls have been raped, gang raped, enslaved and mutilated while their village is burnt or when they leave the displaced persons camp to collect water, food or fuel or to travel to the market. Even those with a mandate to protect and assist children and women commit acts of sexual and gender-based violence. In a six-month period in 2004, 68 allegations were made against UN soldiers in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including some involving a child prostitution ring and rape of children by soldiers.

Sexual violence is only one of the types of gender-based violence that is exacerbated during armed conflict. Other forms of violence against girls also increase during conflict, such as early or forced marriage, infanticide, enforced sterilisation, domestic violence and trafficking. Sexual violence is a brutal crime. It is a means of warfare when used to torture, extract information, degrade, intimidate or punish. Rape has also been used to bring about ethnic cleansing of an area by spreading fear and compelling people to leave. Sexual violence committed during armed conflict is prohibited under the Geneva convention and is a war crime under the statute of the International Criminal Court.

Because of the accompanying psychological and physical trauma, rape often threatens livelihoods and economic productivity, as well as spreading fear, disease and injury. Violence against women can reach such proportions that every aspect of life becomes pervaded by its threat or use, and the continuing social and cultural impact can of course inhibit peace building and recovery.

Five years ago, the Security Council resolution on peace, women and security was passed, but the international community has yet to realise fully and respond to causes and consequences of rape for both individual survivors and communities. Perpetrators remain unpunished and survivors go without adequate support. Sexual violence programmes, including the delivery of support services, physical protection measures and action to ensure long-term prevention, are largely absent from humanitarian responses. Underfunding, limited capacity and resources, poor co-ordination among partners and a general lack of organisational commitment hinder many efforts to address sexual violence.

A growing body of evidence indicates the enormity of the problem of gender-based violence among refugees and the internally displaced in post-conflict situations, and the lack of adequate prevention and response. The development of appropriate responses has recently begun under the auspices of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, but it is important that that work gathers apace in all situations where it is required.

Trafficking in women has become a global problem and is one of the world's greatest violations of human rights. Up to 1,500 girls and young women are traded into the UK every year and those affected are getting younger and younger, with many as young as 15. I accept that the Minister has been working hard on the issues, but to eliminate the trafficking of women into the UK we must make progress on the three main areas of prosecution, protection and prevention.

As violence against women is frequently rooted in the unequal balance of power between men and women, the most effective counter-measure over the long term must be continual progress towards the empowerment of women, equal educational opportunities for girls and, for adult women, greater control over their resources and greater decision-making powers. Those are the prerequisites in the drive to eliminate the traffic of human beings.

The most extreme form of gender-based violence is of course honour killing, which is used mainly to control women's sexuality. A woman who is raped or voluntarily engages in sex outside marriage is considered to have defiled the family name. In some cases the woman may be only suspected of dishonourable behaviour, but the allegation is enough to dishonour her family.

In some countries the law allows honour killing, even where it is not explicitly permitted. The crime may not be prosecuted or, as in Iraq, a very lenient sentence will be handed down. The penal code in Jordan exempts from any penalty a man who kills, wounds or injures a female relative who has committed adultery, and a similar law exists in Syria. Hundreds of women are killed every year in Pakistan for crimes such as adultery, breaking an arranged marriage or simply attempting a divorce.

Honour killings are committed worldwide and they must be tackled. They occur whenever a man regards a woman as his property and seeks to uphold that false assumption by cruel and abusive force. The United Nations Population Fund estimates that as many as 5,000 females are killed every year, and Scotland Yard believes that there were 12 honour killings in the UK last year.

Governments need to reform all laws that serve as barriers to women's equality. Women cannot stand alone in their demand for social justice. Other sectors of society must be involved. Women need allies among politicians, religious leaders and health professionals. Since the UN declaration on the elimination of violence against women much progress has been made in establishing sexual and reproductive rights, but there is a lot more to do in translating those rights into policies. Persistent discrimination and violence against women and girls is also a persistent barrier to achievement, a violation of their human rights and a threat to sustainable development.

Gender-based violence causes more death and disability among women between the ages of 15 and 44 than cancer, malaria, traffic accidents and war put together. Gender-based violence is rightly condemned worldwide. The violent abuse of women is a violation of their human rights and must receive persistent and insistent international censure.

3.7 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to be called today and, in the light of the large number of hon. Members present, I shall try to keep my remarks brief.

The Minister referred to the co-operation between our Government and European and worldwide Governments. I should like to bring to the Chamber's attention the position in Guatemala, which is a particularly appalling case in terms of the treatment of women. I pay tribute to Megan Anderson, Sophie Barker, Gemma Haywood and James Grant of Ibstock community college in my constituency, who recently wrote to alert me to the appalling crimes that are being committed in that country.

I contacted the two Ministers in the Department for International Development earlier this year, asking what was being done to help the Guatemalan authorities to reduce the incidence of violent crime against Guatemalan women. To put the matter into context, 1,000 Guatemalan women have been murdered in the past two years. That is in a country of about 13 million people—a fifth of the size of this country. One could only imagine the impact of such appalling atrocities if 5,000 women were killed over a two-year period in this country. The Under-Secretary of State for International

[David Taylor]

Development reassured me about the contacts that had been made with the Guatemalan presidential commission on human rights and the fact that our country, I am pleased to say, provides 18 per cent. of the funding for European Community programmes to Guatemala in that respect.

The second question that I raised was with the Minister for Europe, asking what contacts he had had with his Guatemalan counterpart about the status and treatment of Guatemalan women. Although that had not been discussed in any detail, on 7 October 2005, officials from the British embassy in Guatemala met a representative from the Guatemalan human rights prosecutors office to discuss the serious rise in violent acts against women in that country. A representative from Guatemala's network for the prevention of violence against women was also present.

I was relieved to hear the Minister talk about the European and international links that have been established by our Government, because the position in Guatemala is extraordinarily depressing and tragic. Many women and girls in Guatemala live with gender-based violence. Violence against women in the family, rape and sexual harassment in the workplace are common, and women and young girls are the victims of commercial trafficking and, as we have heard from two speakers, sexual exploitation. Most appallingly of all, police officers have been implicated in cases of sexual violence in that country. A number of victims of the killings—I have given an indication of the scale—were under 18 years of age.

The United Nations special rapporteur on violence looked into this dreadful example of a country allowing violence against women, and he found that the Guatemalan Government were failing in their international obligation to prevent, investigate and prosecute violence against women. Last year, a special police unit was established to investigate and prevent crimes against women, but it was reportedly insufficiently resourced to deal with the scale of the problem.

It is not all bleak in Guatemala: more women there go out to work than have ever done so before, and they stay in education for longer and express themselves more freely than ever before. However, in much of the country their reward is the perpetual fear of violent, sudden death. Prostitutes and female gang members are at the most serious risk, but the death toll includes women from all walks of life.

Let me conclude with a reference to Amnesty International that links with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty). Independent assessors have established the reasons for the dreadful position in Guatemala, where three and a half decades of internal conflict have produced cheap guns and a culture of violence, which has worsened the position. First, there is no respect for the body; people feel that they can treat women however they like—that is almost a cultural expectation. Secondly and finally, there is the idea that women are somebody's property. Those values need to be challenged. In a recent report, Amnesty International called on the Guatemalan Government to improve public education, inject real urgency into criminal investigations and reform outdated laws on rape and sexual violence.

Yesterday was international women's day, and I am delighted with the achievements of our Government. I come from a female-dominated household, with four daughters and lots of sisters and sisters-in-law, so I feel that I have the privilege of being able to contribute to the debate on their behalf. Our Government's natural focus and priority has been within the United Kingdom, but they will reach out to other countries. I urge both Ministers present to see what they can do to establish links with, and improve the appalling position of, women in Guatemala.

3.13 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I very much welcome the fact that we are having this important debate to mark international women's day. In January, I was lucky enough to come high in the ballot for Prime Minister's questions, and I used the opportunity to question the Prime Minister about violence against women. In doing my research for that, I came across a frightening statistic. Nearly half the women in the United Kingdom have experienced domestic violence, sexual assault or stalking. That is the kind of statistic that one reads and wonders whether it can really be true. However, I went away and researched it, and there it was in black and white from 45 per cent. of real women talking about their experiences to the British crime survey. That underlines how wide ranging the problem is and how often it occurs behind closed doors. It is happening in every constituency in the country.

I am not sure that I received as full an answer as I wanted from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but time is very short at Prime Minister's questions, so I shall give him the benefit of the doubt. However, I would very much welcome it if the Minister who responds to the debate would comment on the idea of an integrated strategy across Departments to deal with the issue. It is good to have a strategy on domestic violence, but we need to recognise that that is only one aspect of violence against women. There are sex crimes, trafficking, which has been mentioned already and involves the Home Office and the Foreign Office—

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Does the hon. Lady accept that violent internet pornography of the sort that led to the brutal murder of Jane Longhurst is also a form of violence against women? Will she take this opportunity to praise Jane's mother, Liz Longhurst, who has spearheaded an all-party campaign against violent, exploitative internet images in which women are raped, tortured or murdered in the name of private profit and sexual gratification?

Jo Swinson: Certainly. I very much welcome the opportunity to do so, and to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his hard work on that issue. It is a good example of how violence against women involves all aspects of Government and many Departments, particularly the Department of Health, the Department for Education and Skills and even the Department for Transport where it concerns women travelling home safely, often late at night. It is vital for the issue to be on the agenda and discussed and acted on in every Department. I hope that the Minister will express support for that strategy, as endorsed by the End Violence Against Women Coalition.

Today, I should particularly like to discuss an issue that was brought to my attention by a women's refuge in my constituency, the Women's Aid refuge in Bishopbriggs, which I visited yesterday. It opened fairly recently, and comprises five flats that provide a great haven for women who are fleeing domestic violence. The issue that they raised with me was not one that I might have expected—it was television licences. That is an issue because when many women take the difficult decision to flee their partners, they do not at first have the confidence to go into the communal area of the refuge. They often want the safety and security of being within their own, self-contained flat with a locked door.

The charity Refuge tells me that women often say that the television is a great source of comfort, perhaps as a way to entertain their children or just to provide background noise, which gives them a feeling of security. The situation that was brought to my attention and which I found shocking concerned the fact that the refuge had been told that it needed one licence to cover the property, but shortly afterwards started receiving angry reminder letters saying that it needed a licence for each flat. What was worse was the fact that the letters went to the women in the individual flats who were fleeing domestic violence.

That was obviously distressing for the women in their vulnerable state. The refuge wrote to the television licensing enforcement people, explained the nature of the property, said that it had been told that it needed only one licence and asked the agency to send any future correspondence to the office instead. What happened then was that one Friday night at 6 o'clock an enforcement officer came round. The staff had left the refuge, but he demanded entry and the 20-year-old mother who answered the door and let him in was bullied into signing forms to make instalments and payments. She was very distressed for the entire weekend. Eventually, the staff who came back on the Monday morning were able to sort out the situation.

Hon. Members will know that the most dangerous thing that a woman suffering domestic violence can do is to leave her partner. That is when she is at the highest risk of homicide. Men often stalk their partners and try to gain access to refuges. One of the most common ways in which they do that is to pose as officials, such as plumbers or council officials. It is unacceptable for television licensing people to force their way into women's refuges. Looking into the issue, I was further appalled to learn that hotels and guest houses require only one licence per 15 rooms. Although they are private enterprises, they do not have to have one licence per room; they have a concession. Residential care homes also have a concessionary rate per room.

Many of the people in women's refuges are staying there temporarily, whether for a few days, a few weeks or even a few months. There is a very strong case—I have written to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport about it—to extend the concessionary scheme to include women's refuges. I very much hope that that will be done in the upcoming BBC charter review. I should particularly like to know whether the Minister responding to the debate would be prepared to support that initiative on an issue that affects women's refuges throughout the country. It might be a small matter, but it is one that we should take the opportunity to sort out.

3.19 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate following international women's day. I congratulate the two Ministers present and the Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett), who inevitably cannot speak today, on organising things so well yesterday, when in the rain with our umbrellas we attended at the statue of Emmeline Pankhurst. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Looking up through the umbrellas, I thought it a very celebratory event. Today's discussion is, inevitably, much more serious, and all the contributions so far have reflected that. I think that the women who paved the way for us to be here today would probably have approved of today's debate not being self-congratulatory, but focusing on the serious issues that still beset us.

In her opening speech, the Minister said that if there is one message to send it should be that violence is not acceptable wherever it occurs, whether in our homes or on the streets, in our country or abroad. The two speeches on trafficking particularly struck home with me. I shall comment briefly on that issue before I refer to local matters of domestic violence.

The Minister made a brave decision to turn around policy relating to prostitution. If anything illustrates the reason why that had to be done, it is the fact that these days trafficking of the sort described by the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) is tied up with violent crime to such an extent that it is pretty well impossible to think that the path that we were previously considering of having tolerance zones could have served the interests of women or made their lives safer. I greatly welcome the co-ordinated strategy to take policy forward and to consider how we can help women to escape and clamp down on the men who are conniving with these crimes. There is no other way of looking at it: whenever a man uses a prostitute, the chances are that he is ensuring that drug crime and the even more deep-seated—often twin—relationship between trafficking and drug crime can continue. That must be seen to be unacceptable.

I make no apology for turning to domestic matters, now. I greatly welcome the Ministers who are on the Front Bench today. There are so many Members who want to speak, Mr. Illsley, that I hope that you will, if you have the opportunity, tell the House authorities that we need an international women's day debate in the main Chamber. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

I shall use the rest of my brief contribution to celebrate and to paint the background to what is happening in Plymouth. I make no apology for doing that. We probably all have a catalogue of what is happening in relation to domestic violence in our constituencies, but we in Plymouth have struggled over the years to try to establish adequate services and gain resources for dealing with these matters. Ours is about the 15th largest city in the country, but only in recent years have we managed to establish a Women's Aid service, which has had its ups and downs.

[Linda Gilroy]

Research carried out in Devon in 2001 estimated that there are about 175,000 incidents of domestic violence in Plymouth each year, many of which are, of course, repeat incidents. It is also estimated that 10,000 local women are likely to experience domestic violence in any one year. Plymouth's police domestic violence unit receives reports of almost 6,000 incidents a year, and there were three domestic violence-related murders in one month in Plymouth in November 2004. Now that we have an established Plymouth Women's Aid, it supports more than 2,000 women a year, either through face-to-face advice and assistance, or via its telephone helpline. It received more than 650 referrals from the police between July and September of 2005. In addition, the women's refuge supports about 120 women and their children each year at its 11-bedroom unit.

The Minister said that domestic violence costs the state, employers and victims £23 billion a year. Based on the figures that I just quoted, I calculate that the total cost of domestic violence per year in Plymouth alone is £12.4 million for services, £10.8 million in costs to the economy, and £68 million in the costs associated with human and emotional scarring and support services. That is a total cost of about £92 million a year in my city alone. Those are shocking figures.

In June 2003, the Government published "Safety and Justice". At that time, services in Plymouth were really rather down, so I decided that it would be good to bring people together. We held a seminar and produced our own response to the Government consultation process, called "Views from Plymouth on Safety and Justice". At that time, we were talking about prevention, protection, justice, support and what more needed to be done—for example, raising awareness, having better education, and doing something about children and family services and housing services in Plymouth. We were also trying to improve the operation of the courts to reduce the time taken to get cases to court, and to improve how people were treated there. We were also looking closely at the Leeds pilot on how to bring domestic violence cases to special courts as, perhaps, showing the way forward. We very much hope to see that in Plymouth in the near future.

I hope that those actions led, in part, to the coming together of a visioning day in Plymouth a year later. It led to the formation of the Plymouth domestic abuse network in February 2005, which has been working hard on housing. It has a housing domestic abuse working party that is considering how we can improve what were quite dire circumstances for women seeking a way out of damaging marital home set-ups. There is now a 15-point action plan to chart the way ahead. We also have a Signpost Care-supported housing project, and hope to have more safe and secure housing units in the city, which can be used specifically for at-risk women.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) quoted a shocking statistic about young boys and their attitudes. I was pleased when the partnership in Plymouth had a highly successful week of events during domestic violence awareness week in November 2005. One such event, a musical extravaganza, involved 600 young people from local schools, colleges and youth groups. All of the entertainment was provided by young people. There were dancers, singers, and rap artists, many of whom had written their own material about domestic abuse and its effect on them and their peers. The evening was used to launch the Plymouth young citizens' domestic abuse forum, to which more than 200 young people signed up on the night. Its work is now being taken forward by a young man of 19, who co-ordinated the running of the evening and is now working closely with Plymouth Women's Aid to tackle the issue.

Much still needs to be done. I hope that in charting the way ahead in the forthcoming comprehensive spending review, Ministers will argue for further resources, because funding is still very fragile and partnerships in Plymouth have to spend a lot of time looking for funding. As the partnership in Plymouth said to me,

> "Lack of substantial and sustainable funding for services . . . are a vicious circle—no funding means lack of progress, lack of progress means no funding."

There has been huge progress in the past three years in developing partnership working and more joined-upness at local level, but goodness knows there is a great deal more to do.

Finally, I think that we have all had the briefing from the Equal Opportunities Commission. Others might refer to hopes that the gender equality duty in the Equality Act 2006 will "mainstream" the approach to tackling violence across our public, private and voluntary sectors, and achieve the sort of joined-unless that the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) seeks. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality will refer to that in her closing remarks.

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): I am pleased that we are having this debate today. It is important that we discuss the subject in the open, because bringing domestic violence out into the open helps us to combat it. I take domestic violence seriously, and I am delighted to see so many Members attending the debate and intending to speak. It is good to see that so many of us are dedicated to tackling the issues that surround domestic violence and to improving the dire situation suffered by so many adults and children throughout Britain.

I am sure that everybody is already aware of the horrific statistics on domestic violence, but it is always worth remembering that domestic violence costs the lives of more than two women each week and accounts for nearly a quarter of all recorded violent crime in England and Wales. Dire statistics like those prove how vital, how long overdue and how desperately needed Government action to tackle domestic violence is.

I welcome the extensive new measures introduced in the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 and the important role that the Act has played in raising the profile of domestic violence across Britain. I recently asked the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for exact figures on how much the Government are investing in improving services for women seeking refuge from domestic violence. I was pleased to hear that more than £30 million is being invested over three years in new refuge provision and refurbishment of existing refuges. As access to information is also important to domestic violence victims, another £1.4 million is being invested over three years to develop the new national domestic violence helpline, which is supported by UKRefugesOnline—a vital link.

Although I am incredibly pleased that such comprehensive legislation has at long last been introduced to support victims of domestic violence, it is by no means any indication that we can rest on our laurels. As the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) mentioned, the British crime survey shows that almost half of all women experience domestic violence, sexual assault or stalking in their lifetime. We clearly have a long way to go. To put that statistic into context, if we were to apply it to all the female MPs in this House, 63 would have had their lives affected in some way by those abhorrent crimes.

Legislation to punish offenders and support victims is not enough. The root causes of domestic violence must also be addressed and the general attitudes towards it must be changed. As with so many of the social problems that we in Britain face, legal changes are not sufficient to break the cycle. To my mind, education remains the key way to tackle such problems head on and to change attitudes in the long run. Much education seems not to address sufficiently the attitudes that lead to violence against women, and the different attitudes towards violence held by girls and boys are not addressed in a systematic and consistent way.

Ms Katy Clark (North Ayrshire and Arran) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making the point that violence against women affects women of all classes and from all walks of life. I am also grateful to her for talking about children. When we talk to men who perpetrate violence against women, we often find that they experienced a great deal of violence in the home when they were children. Does my hon. Friend agree that tackling the root of the problem involves changing the attitudes of the present generation of young people and ensuring that we target our resources to ensure that we are not perpetuating problems for future generations?

Lynda Waltho: I agree with my hon. Friend. In fact, I will address that issue as I go further into my speech.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon), I was shocked and disgusted to read the research undertaken by the universities of Warwick, Bristol, Durham and North London, which explored the understanding and attitudes of more than 1,300 children aged between 8 and 16 about domestic violence. It revealed disturbing trends that suggested that work in schools to address the issue must start at an early age. More than 75 per cent. of 11 and 12-year-old boys thought that women get hit if they make men angry, and more boys than girls of all ages believed that some women deserve to be hit.

Such attitudes must be changed if the next generation of children is to grow up in a safer world. The Equal Opportunities Commission argues that addressing violence against women is not simply a matter for criminal justice, but that it requires a more holistic approach. A role needs to be played by social services, the health service, the education system, child care services and other agencies. Everyone, male and female, young and old, must learn that violence is wholly unacceptable in any shape and form and that it will never be tolerated, as it should not be in any civilised society.

Equally disturbing was a recent survey by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which revealed that far too many of our young people are subjected to relationship abuse in their teenage years. That illustrates that there is still much work to be done if we are to create a culture change that makes domestic violence socially unacceptable for future generations.

As a former teacher and the mother of two teenage boys, I know that the education of young people on the subject is particularly important. One incident of domestic violence is reported to the police every minute across England and Wales. Last year in Dudley, the area that covers Stourbridge, children were present in 1,173 of the 3,400 incidents involving domestic violence to which police were called. We also know that 35 per cent. of households that experience a first assault will experience a second within five weeks. It is vital that those statistics are picked up and acted on, and that they inform our policy.

The effects on children who are present when such attacks take place cannot be underestimated. I remember not too long ago discussing the issue with a dear old gentleman in his 70s. He is a strong, capable man who worked hard all his life and survived bringing up three very opinionated daughters, of whom he is proud. Not much fazes him, but on mention of this topic he began to tell me the story of his childhood. He told me of the cruelty of his father and his feeling of powerlessness to assist his mother when she was being beaten. On one occasion, he was so fearful for his own life that he ran from protecting his mother and hid behind an old washing tub, where he waited with his fingers in his ears until the rage and the sound of the blows had stopped. In his eyes, I could see the fear and shame of a young boy, powerless to come to the aid of his beloved mother. It was as real to him as if it happened only yesterday, not 70 years ago. He wept; I was not far from doing the same.

Such fear and pain rarely leaves victims, so we need to push forward as far as we can with young people. I would like to share an approach that is used in my constituency to raise young people's awareness of domestic violence and the issues that surround it. A few weeks ago I attended a conference on domestic violence with a difference at Redhill school. It was not for women's groups or refuges, but for year 10 and year 11 students. The first part of the conference took the form of a piece of drama, which was extremely powerful and moving. It introduced the pupils to four aspects of domestic violence: emotional, physical, sexual and financial. They met male and female victims of domestic violence as well as professionals, and then they participated in four workshops. The first considered the health implications of domestic violence, the second took the perspective of the police and the child protection service, and the third considered the local safeguarding children board. The fourth workshop was the one that the young people found most effective. It explored the victims' perspectives, and the young people had the opportunity to talk with and question both male and female victims of domestic violence. They also considered the effect that experience of domestic violence has on children.

[Lynda Waltho]

The support and education that the young people received did not simply end after the conference ended. The co-ordinator and volunteers from the refuges who organised the conference also had drop-ins at the school for some time afterwards; they worked with the school's child protection co-ordinator, spoke with young people and addressed any issues that might have been raised by the conference. As well as providing vital emotional support for some young people, that approach also meant that young people do not have to disclose private information in front of others.

The young people gave the project positive feedback. They found the drama powerful and learnt a lot though the workshops. Some said that they had not realised the huge extent to which domestic violence is both physically and mentally draining on its victims, and about its effects on children as well as adults. Some commented that they had not realised how hard the police worked. Many expressed outrage that the punishments given to domestic violence offenders often did not fit the seriousness of the crime. They found it particularly enlightening because the majority admitted that they had not considered the perspective of male victims, or even that male victims existed. Bearing in mind that the conference received such positive feedback, I would like to see a similar approach being considered more widely so that children and young people across England and Wales can benefit from the wide range of topics and interactive approaches that children in my constituency are benefiting from.

While I would never dream of claiming that I have any sort of expert knowledge about how to tackle the root cause of domestic violence, I would like to share a few findings from the recent Women Against Violence Europe report of 2005. The report shed an optimistic light on the situation, claiming that violence in our society was neither inevitable nor universal. In a cross-cultural study of 90 societies around the world, anthropologist David Levinson found 16 communities where interpersonal violence was absent or rare.

As we begin the enormous task of trying to lead our society to a less violence place, it is worth bearing in mind the factors that Levinson found predicted low or no family violence, and thinking about what other positive steps we should take to ensure that our society does not foster and breed violence. The factors included stable relationships, economic equality between the sexes, equal access to divorce for men and women, availability of alternative caretakers for children, norms that encourage the non-violent settlement of disputes outside the home, and cultural norms that recognise the dignity of every human being. It is important to remember that the societies studied are not free of the emotions that elsewhere lead to violence; they just deal with them in a non-violent manner.

Domestic violence is not an inevitable part of society and it should never be treated as such, either here or in any other country. It is important that all members of a community realise that it is their responsibility to change attitudes and to make the community one in which domestic violence is recognised and treated as the abhorrent and unacceptable crime it is.

Last November, I attended an exhibition run by Amnesty International in which members of the public were asked to imagine what a world without violence against women would be like. I know that many hon. Members present contributed to the exhibition. Their imaginings were printed on to flags and displayed as one of the exhibits. Reading the contributions was a moving experience, and I was saddened by the number of women who had simply written that in a world without violence against women they could feel safe in their own homes and could bring up their children in an environment where they were not terrified for their safety. It is truly tragic that we live in a society where that is not the case, and where thousands of women still do not feel safe in their own homes. Those imaginings of safety, security and peace should not be just dreams; a life free from domestic violence should be the right of all women of all ages.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): Like other speakers, I greatly welcome this debate and the fact that so many Members want to speak in it. I also welcome what the Government are doing to combat violence against women and to help victims to get the support that they need. I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) said about commending the Government on their change of stance on prostitution; that gives an important and welcome signal.

Before this debate, I asked Women's Aid in Oxford what it regarded as the key priorities, because like others here I think that it is crucial that what we say in these debates is informed by experience from the front line. We are all indebted to organisations such as Women's Aid, Refuge, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Relate and the YWCA, which do such invaluable work and which have campaigned so long and hard on this vital subject.

In terms of priorities, Oxford Women's Aid stressed to me the crucial contribution of effective inter-agency working and the need to sustain resources, notably in the supporting people programme, which is under real pressure in Oxfordshire and elsewhere. It also stressed the importance of outreach work, both in helping women to move from the refuge to a safe home and environment in the community, and in helping to address acute needs, especially those of people exposed to drug and alcohol abuse or suffering from mental health problems.

Women's Aid highlighted particular matters on which more attention was needed, and I shall mention them in no particular order. I heard about difficulties in getting injunctions against abusive partners quickly enough. Cases were cited of support workers and clients having to wait two weeks for an appointment with a solicitor, during a period when the woman—and often her children—are particularly vulnerable. I was told that the police and the Crown Prosecution Service need to initiate more prosecutions for violent behaviour, rather than leaving it up to the woman to press charges, when she is in fear of retribution.

There is a need for more refuge places and move-on support, so that victims' longer-term needs can be properly addressed. Ensuring secure arrangements with proper risk assessments for fathers meeting their children is also important, as access arrangements are often a means of continuing harassment of women, whether directly or indirectly through the children. There is also a need for more 24-hour support refuges—there are none in the Oxford area—where help can be given to those facing serious drug and alcohol abuse problems. Such people are, if anything, at particular risk of being propelled out of one abusive relationship and into another, and their need for support, counselling and protection are especially acute.

Women's Aid also highlighted the particular problem in Oxford of finding longer-term accommodation, including accommodation for those victims of violence who do not have children. They are often in a very difficult position as regards housing on social priority grounds. That issue needs to be addressed by social housing providers, who should recognise that victims of abuse are usually driven to an even poorer and weaker position in the housing market. Better support for pregnant women experiencing domestic violence is also needed, given the evidence referred to by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), which showed that, sadly, pregnancy is often a trigger for aggression by male partners.

As others have said, we as a society need not only to tackle the symptoms, but to address the causes of violence in terms of the attitudes and values underpinning what is considered acceptable behaviour, and the expectations and knowledge of men and women, young and older, as regards their rights and obligations. Both Women's Aid and the YWCA in Oxford have drawn to my attention to a number of important points about raising awareness and understanding, and tackling the behaviour that gives rise to domestic violence. For example, there is a need to ensure that domestic violence issues are discussed in schools in a sensitive way and with an awareness of the extent to which violence is a gender issue.

There is a real and present challenge. Other hon. Members have already cited statistics, but the NSPCC recently found that one in five teenage girls has been hit by a boyfriend and one in three young women says that cheating on a boyfriend could justify him hitting her. As others have said, the problem is in our culture, including in our youth culture, and we all have a responsibility to do what we can to change it. In addition, we need dedicated funding for projects working with young women from ethnic minority communities to ensure that their specific needs are addressed; too often, they are not.

Of course, if we are ever to end violence against women, we need to provide support for projects that challenge and try to change aggressive behaviour in young men and attitudes that accept violence against women. As I have seen at first hand through the work of the Family Nurturing Network in Oxford, schools can be a useful hub for work on family and personal relationships. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Lynda Waltho) said, well directed programmes can make a real difference in enabling children from quite a young age and their parents to learn how better to talk with one another about their emotional needs. Such programmes can also help them to learn how to manage anger, because at the end of the day, the cultural, social and personal circumstances that give rise to coercive relationships and a tolerance of hitting out physically in anger or jealousy are what feed violence against women. As a society, and through all society's social institutions—not only Government—we must say, "Enough is enough." Furthermore, there should be a consistent, determined drive to prevent abusive behaviour, protect its victims and re-educate, as well as prosecute and punish, its perpetrators.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): It is good that this debate on domestic abuse has been called to coincide with international women's day, as it gives Members of Parliament the opportunity to highlight issues that are important to women in the UK and internationally, as many hon. Members' contributions have shown. I shall stick to the domestic agenda.

I pay tribute to the Government for the great progress that has been made. The Minister listed some of the great achievements. I also pay tribute to the work that women did in the early days when setting up Women's Aid. I remember Welsh Women's Aid being started up on a shoestring. The women involved were so determined to get domestic violence recognised as a scourge. I pay tribute to those who started the recognition process. When do we hear people saying, "It's only a domestic," nowadays? That used to be so common, and we know that the police thought that. There has been a huge change and a great many advances. There is a long way to go, but we have made a lot of progress.

I shall talk about what is happening in Cardiff. The Women's Safety Unit, which was started four or five years ago as a Home Office-funded project, is now funded by the Welsh Assembly and comes under the auspices of the Cardiff domestic abuse forum, which I chair. That ground-breaking project has significantly increased the number of women who are prepared to go to court, and significantly reduced the number of repeat victimisations. All the statistics show that if there is a really good advocacy project, with people who are prepared to go out on a limb to help the victims, there can be a much fairer justice system.

One unique thing about Cardiff Women's Safety Unit is that there are secondments from the police and the probation service. A serving policewoman is a full member of the team, along with secondments from Women's Aid, the probation service and project workers. The plan to have similar services available to victims throughout the seven south Wales police districts is enthusiastically supported by one of the few women chief constables in England and Wales, Barbara Wilding. We hope that advocacy can be made available in each area, so we can see the statistics improve. The repeat victimisation statistics are the most striking. We have already heard how women are often the victims, time and again, but we have been able to get those numbers down.

A domestic violence court has been developed in Cardiff. The roll-out of the specialist domestic violence court programme by the Home Office is an important development. In Wales we have three such courts in Cardiff, Caerphilly, and Neath Port Talbot. The court in Rhondda Cynon Taf will be starting in May and the one in Gwent will start at about the same time. However, there is an issue in relation to starting these courts that we have to recognise. The Home Office says that to establish such a court requires the presence of an advocacy service—somebody has to be there to support the women in court and advocate on their behalf. There must also be risk assessments, MARACs—multi-agency risk assessment conferences—and independent domestic violence advisers. That is a real problem in some areas that are trying to start up domestic abuse courts, because funding for the courts does not include funding for those additional services. The areas in Wales where the programme is progressing are finding it difficult to provide the services.

We know that having well trained advocates who will go out on a limb for the women who have been abused produces results—we have seen that in the Cardiff Women's Safety Unit. Although I strongly welcome the roll-out of the specialist domestic violence court programme, it must be acknowledged that advocacy services are not always there to run alongside the courts. Perhaps the Minister will say how we can move the process on.

Where domestic violence courts are operating, the results are good. In Caerphilly since the mainstreaming of the specialist domestic violence court system, in the period from January 2005 to September 2005 the total average of successful outcomes was 73 per cent. Only 19 per cent. of cases were discontinued, in 4 per cent. no evidence was given on the day and in 3 per cent. the accused was found not guilty at trial. Those stunning statistics show what can be done. How are we going to support those courts and make money available to ensure that the advocacy is there?

Cardiff university has studied the Cardiff Women's Safety Unit and the interface between the civil and the criminal courts and its recent report says that the interface in Cardiff is completely dependent on the Women's Safety Unit advocates, who support victims through the legal process. The report by Dr. Amanda Robinson says that without such advocacy arrangements in place there would be no interface at all and decision making by either court would be based on partial information. That study emphasises how important it is to have an holistic multi-agency response to domestic violence.

Civil law is an important part of that holistic approach. In Cardiff, the Women's Safety Unit offers free legal advice for the initial consultation by a core group of specialist solicitors on a rota, who see the women in the safety of the unit and are able to advise them. However, that is only the initial consultation. The survey of women from the Women's Safety Unit expressed a lot of dissatisfaction about the civil courts: they said that they felt unsafe and would like to see a police officer in the civil court so that they felt protected. On a point that has already been made today, the women consulted by Cardiff university felt that the system was designed to keep fathers involved, rather than to keep people safe. Most of the respondents felt that a combined civil-criminal court would be beneficial and would prevent duplication and overlap. The director of the Cardiff Women's Safety Unit, Jan Pickles, who has given inspirational leadership to the project, says:

"In domestic violence cases, there is an artificial divide between civil and criminal courts which is bureaucratically neat, but fails victims and their children. Safety can only be achieved when victims have access to both forms of justice."

I shall be grateful if the Minister tells us whether there are any further proposals to develop more courts in which criminal and civil matters are linked. I do not know what stage of development the courts in Croydon have got to, but I believe that there is an attempt there to link civil and criminal proceedings. To bring the criminal and civil courts together on domestic violence issues would be an important long-term aim. I know that that would be difficult, because solicitors are trained and specialise in one type of law, as I believe judges are, but that would, in the longer term, be a much more satisfactory way of dealing with things.

Finally, I should like to mention the Equality Act 2006, which introduces a duty on public bodies to promote sex equality. Public bodies will have to ensure that their policies reflect the different needs of women and men. All hon. Members have probably had a briefing from the Equal Opportunities Commission, which says that violence against women is one of the biggest forms of gender inequality. The EOC will play a vital role in promoting the gender duty. I should like as much assurance from the Minister as she can give that adequate funding will be available for the EOC to carry out that duty.

As the American writer, Maya Angelou, says,

"Being a woman is hard work", but we have the power, through the various measures we can bring about through government and being MPs, to make the job of being a woman—especially one suffering from domestic violence—that little bit easier.

3.59 pm

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): Under normal circumstances it is a pleasure to take part in this debate, but the reality is that we are halfway through the first decade of the 21st century and still find ourselves debating a blight on our society. Even if we were to say that this is a modern society, we have to ask whether we are making any progress in eliminating the vile problem of domestic abuse that still hides away in far too many homes. In my contribution, I want to concentrate on domestic violence.

I looked at some of the historical facts on the Women's Aid website. Until the end of the 19th century, the law supported the right of men to control their wives by force; it intervened to restrain violence, not prevent it. In the late 18th century, a certain Judge Butler held that assaults on wives were legal, provided that the husband used a stick no thicker than his thumb. That subsequently led to the saying "the rule of thumb".

Thankfully, legislation has changed a great deal, although there is still a question mark over some decisions that the judiciary come to. During the year we entered the 21st century, there were an estimated 15 million incidents of domestic violence in the UK, more than 85 per cent. of which were committed by men. As hon. Members have said, two women are killed by their current or former partners every week. More than 60 per cent. of reported incidents end in injury, and about 81 per cent. of those victims are women.

Domestic violence is nothing less than a horror—a horror for the direct victims, but also for the tens of thousands of other innocent victims: the young witnesses of violence inflicted by one deeply loved individual on another. Theirs are tortured minds and souls that all too often carry those violent experiences right through childhood and into adulthood. Regrettably, as others have said, such children often later turn to domestic violence themselves.

I shall tell one humorous anecdote, which is not about violence. Late last summer, I was told the story of two three-year-old children who lived next door to one another and were playing together. The mothers had overheard them. The little girl Emily had said to the boy, "Let's play mummies and daddies." The little boy agreed, and then the girl said, "I'll clean the house and you go off to the football." Those children came from loving households, and it was the norm for their fathers to go to the football. However, one can see how things are imprinted on children's minds and how, if there had been violence in those households, it would have carried through the generations.

It is astonishing that so many people think domestic violence is acceptable in certain circumstances and that the victim may well have deserved it. For some reason, some who experience such violence blame themselves: figures show that in recent years almost two thirds of women and more than 90 per cent. of men who had been subject to domestic violence did not even think that they had been a victim of crime.

The crime of domestic violence knows no social barriers. It is not found only in certain households: the full social range, from manual or unskilled workers from low-income households to some of the most educated and professional individuals, witness violence, sometimes in its mental as well as its physical form. Nor is the problem found only in the homes of young or middle-aged couples—in recent years, as women have come forward seeking help, it has come to light how long some people have been prepared to tolerate abuse in their homes.

I deal now with how the matter is being tackled in my constituency of Dumfries and Galloway, a large rural area approximately 120 miles long from east to west. Women's Aid has established two offices there—one in Dumfries and one in Stranraer, some 75 miles apart. Both provide excellent help and support through their refuges. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the hard work that they do to help people in times of crisis, when individuals are at their most vulnerable.

We are also fortunate in having a multi-agency Dumfries and Galloway domestic abuse group. Yesterday, I was delighted by news that it had been awarded £100,000 over the next two years by the Scottish Executive's violence against women fund. Delna Weston, the chair of that strategy group, has said that the funding will allow it to expand and develop support right across Dumfries and Galloway through public awareness. That is so important.

We all know that funding is vital, and in my area support from the local authority and the Scottish Executive keeps work going. Having said that, there is always a need for additional finance, and I shall come to that issue later. The steady, but on occasions rapid, increase in self-referrals seems to indicate that widespread media advertising is achieving its aim of encouraging women to make contact with Women's Aid in the local area. Older women, who in the past would have tolerated abuse, are now less reluctant to conceal the truth. The refuge run by the Women's Aid office in Stranraer had a resident who was 88 years old; its youngest contact was just 16.

When women eventually leave their abusive partners, that is only the start of a number of other problems. What about money and finance? Potentially, there are about 20 different organisations to contact—to do with housing, doctors, schools, benefits and solicitors, to name but a few. Where can those women's furniture be stored if they have been lucky enough to be able to remove some possessions? There are other agencies, some run by the Government, such as the Child Support Agency, which all too often simply do not appreciate the fear of threats from ex-partners.

Locally, all that can be offered is a communal refuge for women and their children. That means that they are given their own bedroom, but have to share a kitchen, sitting room, dining room and toilets. Women can be turned away if they have a drug or alcohol addiction, a mental health problem, a son older than 16 or a family pet.

Julie Morgan: Does my hon. Friend agree that in such circumstances, every effort must be made to ensure that the woman stays in the family home and that the perpetrator of the violence is put out?

Mr. Brown: I agree fully with my hon. Friend. Yes, it is important to try to keep the woman in the home, possibly with her children.

I was taken aback by the notion that family pets can be an obstacle to a woman's fleeing her home, despite the violence that may be going on. However, I am delighted to say that the Women's Aid refuge in Dumfries has secured funding from the local authority, and that that has enabled a number of people to come with their family pet, which is dear and precious to them. I shall not read out a letter that I have from a certain lady, but what she went through to put her family pet into a kennel for a short time was heart-rending. However, it enabled her to get away from something that she had experienced for 30 years.

The local offices have recognised that improvements to the service could be made with secure funding that would cover the employment of more staff and training costs. There is a need to move away from the present refuge-type accommodation to cluster flats. Women and children fleeing domestic abuse could be given their own secure flats in which they could have their pets, visitors and, most importantly, a life.

Current office premises are bursting at the seams and more appropriate facilities are becoming necessary in both Dumfries and Stranraer. Raising the profile of the service is essential, but that can happen only with additional staffing. At the same time, it is important to educate all people that domestic abuse is wrong. Ideally, that should be done from an early age, perhaps through the school curriculum, possibly with input from Women's Aid.

[Mr. Brown]

Given that mine is a rural area, it would greatly assist if the service were developed to provide further drop-in sessions in other towns in the region. The service delivery offered by two Women's Aid offices 75 miles apart is far too sparse.

The domestic abuse strategy group recognised that domestic abuse was an issue for everyone, including such service providers as Women's Aid, the police, health and medical services, housing services, Jobcentre Plus, education services, social workers, the Crown Office, the Procurator Fiscal Service, the judiciary and solicitors, as well as many voluntary sector organisations. The issue is important for politicians and decision makers, as it is for all members of the community. All those organisations and individuals have a role in establishing how domestic abuse is viewed. Everyone has a part to play in eliminating it and in providing support to those who experience it.

The group, in formulating its strategy which will cover the period until 2008, established five main aims: working to prevent domestic abuse in the future, making it clear that such abuse is never acceptable; ensuring that there is appropriate protection in place through legislation and policy for those who experience domestic abuse; ensuring that adequate, appropriate and relevant services are provided to address the needs of those who experience domestic abuse; ensuring that all those with a role in tackling domestic abuse work together, recognising their own and others' responsibilities in this matter; and making progress to ensure that those involved carry out appropriate data collection, monitoring, evaluation and reviewing of the work to address domestic abuse.

I am encouraged by the fact that such action is being taken in my own area. I am sure colleagues will share my view that we would much prefer it if such activity were not required in our communities and neighbourhoods. That will happen only when we eliminate domestic violence.

My plea to the Minister is simply for additional funding to support such projects, especially early-intervention work for young people. It is a sad indictment of modern society, which is driven all too often by other agendas, that partners continue to abuse one another both mentally and physically. I suspect that we all have a major job to do for many years to come to change the attitudes of all concerned. I am thinking of those who turn a blind eye to the problem and fail to recognise it and, more importantly, those who are directly involved: the direct victims of abuse, the perpetrators and the even greater innocents, children.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): This is an important debate. Almost a year ago today, the former Member for South Swindon, Julia Drown, secured a similar debate. She raised the disturbing case of a mother and son who were murdered, and brought to the attention of the House the crimes of Alan Pemberton. In November 2003, after shooting his wife Julia and his 17-year-old son William, he took his own life. Those events took place in the neighbouring constituency to mine, Newbury, but the surviving family members live in my constituency. The deaths followed a history of domestic violence, to which the police were alerted 15 months before the tragedy. Sadly, Thames Valley police failed to act on Alan Pemberton's death threats until it was too late.

Defence lawyers and judges often claim that wife-killers are just ordinary men who snap in a moment of extreme provocation, but such circumstances are quite unusual. Only a small number of men murder their partners without having previously used domestic violence against them. Far more common in murder cases is a history of violence by the offender against the victim, as happened in the case of Julia Pemberton. It was a horrifying case, partly because it was so avoidable. Lessons had to be learned about the protection, prevention and provision that we afford to victims.

My predecessor raised the case and I am proud to have continued her work in supporting Frank Mullane, the brother of Julia Pemberton and a constituent of mine, by keeping the House's attention on it. I am pleased that I have been joined in that work by the new hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon). I also give thanks to the work of Baroness Scotland and Refuge, among others. As a consequence of their work, the results in improving the situation for families such as Julia's have been outstanding.

Refuge brought Frank and his family to see my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs. The family told her:

> "We know this is supposed to be an inquisitorial system, but we felt it was an adversarial system, and we felt that it was against us."

They were talking about the system that examines the reasons why Julia's murder occurred. Any system that makes bereaved relatives feel that the whole system is weighted against them is unsatisfactory. I therefore welcome the proposed changes to the coroner system that were announced recently.

Julia Pemberton's persistent pleas for help to the police during 14 months were not enough evidence, at that time, for the coroner to say that anything could have been done to prevent her murder. It cannot be acceptable for judges, coroners and magistrates to be ignorant of the complex dynamics of domestic violence, when they conduct trials and inquests based on domestic violence. They should all engage with Refuge, Women's Aid, the End Violence Against Women Coalition and local authority domestic violence co-ordinators. They should seek out training, for which they will not have to look far. Each of those organisations has a programme and is waiting to be asked to provide it for the people whom I mentioned.

Much more can be achieved in future if the efforts of judges, magistrates and coroners are informed better by the work of organisations fighting violence against women. Julia Pemberton's family have fought extremely hard, and I pay tribute to them. They have been awarded a homicide review and they are now fighting to ensure that it will be fair. It is only by examining what went wrong in cases such as Julia's that we will learn what to do next and how we can improve the protection, prevention and provision afforded to victims. That is why the homicide review is so important and why I mention it in this debate.

Things have changed for the better. My hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Lynda Waltho) referred to the considerable investment in refuges that this Government have made. We have also invested in helplines, training and support. It is only right to do so.

Locally, Wiltshire constabulary has a good track record. In 1997, the Swindon refuge worked with that constabulary to revise its domestic violence policy. It is generally the lead statutory agency in the county and the force is excellent compared with many, including Thames Valley. Wiltshire constabulary welcomes multi-agency working and other forces would do well to emulate its work.

Given what we have learned, can we really say that Julia Pemberton would have been safe from her husband if she was living in today's 21st century world? I do not know the answer to that. The reason why I say that is because today I was contacted by Swindon's family centre. I will not go into the details of the case, because it is a delicate one, but it involves threats, a violent man, and a mother and son in fear; it is history repeated and is too close a reminder of the early days of the Pemberton case. The woman under threat just wants something simple: the protection offered by a new lock on her door. That is not much to ask. Unfortunately, Swindon borough council will not fit one, because she cannot be sure whether or not the violent partner has a key. I find that extraordinary and I mention it so that it will be changed.

That is one specific case that I have taken up, but there are more general issues, some of which hon. Members have mentioned. Cost is one of them. Ironically, the Government's success in raising the profile of domestic violence has brought many more victims forward. That is a good thing, but it puts strain on existing resources. Every new measure that we introduce has a cost attached. Sometimes the additional funding is not easy for statutory or voluntary agencies to find.

I have a bad example to relate from my constituency. The local refuge in Swindon, whose work is recognised nationally, is another victim of our Conservative council's cuts. I hear the words and the commitment of the Opposition party, but words in this place and fine feelings are not enough. We want actions on the ground to support refuges. I hope that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) will take that message to the Conservatives on Swindon borough council. It has supported the refuge since 1977, but under the current administration, proposed funding cuts mean that it might lose a member of staff.

There are also problems relating to financial support for the victim. Applications for benefits for domestic violence victims need to be fast-tracked. They are taking up to two months, but women need financial independence when they have to leave the partner who is abusing them. Then there are problems in the civil courts. The manager of the Swindon refuge says that there are huge difficulties for women trying to get injunctions. That happens in Swindon, and as far as I know the situation is the same around the country. Fewer and fewer solicitors are doing family work and doing what was legal aid, which makes it difficult for victims to access civil law procedures for protection.

Frank Mullane, Julia Pemberton's brother, is calling for a much wider review of Government policy to create a comprehensive integrated strategy to end violence against women. Frank has made that call alongside the campaign to end violence against women, and he was not a campaigner before that happened to his sister.

I agree that we should continue to reinforce the long-term work aimed at preventing violence against women by challenging attitudes that tolerate it, as hon. Members have said. That is why I was glad to see Sarah Brown, the wife of the Chancellor, calling on Valentine's day for an end to the taboo surrounding violence in the home against women and children with Women's Aid. It is also why I am glad to see so many of us in my party and Opposition colleagues speaking today against that taboo.

It was only in 1971 that the first women's refuge opened. Swindon women's refuge opened in 1975. It was only in 1981 that it was made illegal for a man to rape his wife. We are part of one of the first generations to break the domestic violence taboo and I hope that through these debates we can push the Government and local councils even further to provide adequate resources and give priority to the three core areas of protection, prevention and provision so that we can see enduring change.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, let me say that if hon. Members keep contributions as brief as they can, I will be able to call everyone to speak in the debate.

4.22 pm

Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): I want to talk about violence against women at stations. I have been running a safer stations campaign for about the past four weeks and I have been campaigning for all stations to be staffed from the first service to the last. That has been picked up by local press in my constituency, such as the Willesden and Brent Times and the Wembley Observer, which have ensured that people are directed to my website so that they can sign a petition. The campaign has also been picked up by the Evening Standard, and I have gathered about 4,000 signatures. Other London MPs have also taken the issue on board and I hope to present to Parliament a petition of about 10,000 signatures.

We need to see movement on the issue. Ken Livingstone has ensured that an extra 30 British Transport police officers will be on the rail lines to ensure that the stations have a police presence, but it is still up to the rail operators to make sure that stations are staffed and that they use their profits to do that. It is a known fact that women feel not only more vulnerable at stations but that they are more likely to be attacked. In north London alone in 2003–04, five men reported some kind of sexual attack, compared with 90 women. In 2004–05, seven men reported an attack, compared with 98 women. They are just sexual attacks; there are many more attacks of other kinds.

When the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) said that one in two women has suffered from some kind of stalking or attack, I wondered whether I had ever been stalked and the answer came to me—yes. It was about 10 years ago. I came out of the tube station and was followed, and I had to wait in my local shop until we were sure that the person had disappeared before I proceeded to go home. That makes it even more relevant to me that we ensure that rail operators make their stations safer. I started getting off the train one station further along, where there was a cab station outside, and then taking a cab to go back to my home. I did that for my own safety, but not every person will be in a position to do something like that.

Silverlink has been hiding its inadequacies under its Tory franchise agreement, saying that it signed the agreement years ago so it is still valid. It is not. That is unacceptable and it is not good enough. Time has moved on; women travel later at night, and stations open later at night. They deserve to be staffed. It is important that we press all major companies, although they are not covered under the Equality Act 2006, to take seriously the safety and protection of their passengers, especially women.

Safer stations are the right of everyone, and a right of women especially. They pay to travel on the tubes and trains and they deserve safety.

4.25 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I am very glad to follow, albeit at one remove, my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove), who talked about murder and killing under provocation. I had intended to talk about that this afternoon. Homicide law currently favours men who commit murder, usually after a long history of committing domestic violence, as opposed to women who strike back once. Frequently the latter are convicted of murder, while the former are convicted only of manslaughter by means of a defence of provocation, and have their sentence at large. A homicide review is currently going on, and there is a long and detailed argument as to exactly how the situation should be changed, but I invite everyone present to look at that review. Indeed, I might circulate it to people, because it has put forward proposals that would rectify this sexist prejudice in our law.

Instead of talking about that rather wig-and-gowny area, however, I shall go for a quick romp around a document produced recently by the Women's National Commission: an independent analysis of Government initiatives on violence against women called "Making the Grade". Although the last speaker was a notable exception, many people have talked about domestic violence. Violence against women, of course, is not only that. It is forced marriage, crimes in the name of honour, rape, sexual assault, murder, trafficking, sexual exploitation, female genital mutilation, sexual harassment and stalking, and only when we set the great list out in that way do we appreciate the broad sweep of what we are talking about.

We know from a number of contributors that almost half of adult women in England have suffered domestic violence, sexual assault or stalking. One in four women suffers from domestic violence, and it has the highest rate of repeat victimisation of any crime in the UK. Every minute of every day of every week of every month of every year, a police station somewhere is phoned by someone asking for help in a case of domestic violence, and that is just from the people who report it. They are still a minority.

The rate of rape convictions has fallen from one in three cases reported in 1977 to one in 16 at present, which is a 5.3 per cent. conviction rate for rape. Again, that is the case among those who report it. If we compare the figures of those who ring up rape helplines for help with the number of those who report being raped, we can see that probably only about 10 per cent. of women who are raped report it. The rape conviction rate is therefore absolutely negligible.

Moreover, when we consider that women between the ages of 20 and 45 who experience rape or sexual assault are most commonly assaulted by a current or ex-partner and that two of the locations where sexual assaults more frequently occur are the victim's or the perpetrator's own home—and if we bear in mind that domestic violence is violence exactly in a domestic context—we can appreciate how deeply steeped in the very fabric of our society violence against women really is.

This Government have taken a great many positive steps and the list is too long to go through; the Minister mentioned many of them. However, I shall quote "Making the Grade" on this, rather than suggest that it is my own fresh idea, as it says that > "attitudes that tolerate or justify violence are not changing, incidence rates are not falling, conviction rates are not increasing and women and children still fall through the gaps."

I would say that conviction rates are starting to increase in relation to domestic violence because of the domestic violence specialist courts to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) referred, but they are just one or two courts, and conviction rates are generally not increasing.

"Making the Grade" makes the very powerful point that there is a glaring lack of any overall strategic direction from the Government about violence against women. For instance, in England three inter-ministerial groups are operating in parallel: one on domestic violence, one on rape and one on trafficking. There is also work on forced marriage and on female genital mutilation, and separate work on prostitution. Do strategic approaches help? The Greater London domestic violence strategy has led to a fall in domestic homicides against females of one third during the five years for which it has been going, so there is a little suggestion that strategic approaches most certainly do help.

It is not all that surprising that there is no strategic approach, because awareness in the political as opposed to the campaigning field and the demand for action have risen quite quickly. Although we are into and appreciate the subject now, during the 18 years of Tory rule, domestic violence did not raise its head at all. Before 1997, the last time domestic violence was a significant factor in the House of Commons was when Jo Richardson introduced the Domestic Violence and Matrimonial Proceedings Bill as a private Member's Bill in 1976. As there has been so much to do, and because we have done so much and campaign groups, campaigners, Ministers and MPs are all individually interested in dealing with rape, domestic violence or prostitution, development has been piecemeal.

The trouble is that unless the issue of violence against women and its ending is integrated into each Department and its public service agreement, it may easily be chopped away when finances are difficult, cutbacks are needed or the nature of the Government changes so that they are not so supportive of such issues, or when the piecemeal growth with which we are now so pleased stops. In such circumstances, it will be easy to chop off the issue, remove domestic violence specialist courts, which are that little bit more expensive to run than ordinary courts, and remove sexual assault referral centres, which are more expensive than examining people at the police station. It will be very easy for that to occur if there is no integration.

More immediately, women and children fall through the gaps anyway. For example, the domestic violence specialist courts are a great asset. They are built on experience. The magistrates deal with little other than domestic violence, and they become specialists. The prosecutors are specialists in domestic violence, and the police are specialist investigators of domestic violence. Specialism ousts all the old-fashioned and inappropriate attitudes that militated against a good hearing for a domestic violence victim—saying that it was six of one and a half a dozen of the other, or a domestic issue that was so integrated in a relationship that outsiders should not intervene. Specialism is working in domestic violence specialist courts.

With rape, we have not even started that process. There is a nod in the direction of specialist prosecutors and to some extent there are specialist police, but there are no specialist judges. In recent weeks, we have heard extraordinary remarks from judges. There seems to be an incapacity to implement the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The message that specialism ousts prejudice, which has got through in domestic violence, has not got through in rape courts, because there is no overall strategy.

Domestic violence advocates push through the case for the complainant in a domestic violence court, but they also befriend her. The advocate is her friend from start to finish, so if she needs to move house because of the split or threat from her partner, the advocate will help her to find a new home. The advocate will help with child care if the partner's mother used to look after the children and the couple have now split. If benefits need to change, they will help with that. All those things are imperative if a woman who has been violently abused by her loved one is to drive a case through the court. Rape complainants have just as great a need for just as much befriending, but there are no rape advocates, because we put those victims in separate compartments. That is particularly odd, because it is a rare case of domestic violence in which rape is not involved as well.

The "Making the Grade" survey went around all Departments to find out what they were doing to address violence against women, and its report shows up the lack of an integrated strategy. The Home Office—the Department with which I am most closely related—did quite well, getting three out of 10. It undertakes all activities, but it does not do so in an integrated way. The Department for Constitutional Affairs, which is in charge of many of the justice aspects of those issues, got two and a half out of 10. It undertakes the activities, but not in an integrated way. As for the Ministry of Defence, even though it is well known that in the military, where there is a premium on masculinity and male strength, there is more domestic violence, and owing to the clannishness of military culture, it is harder for a forces wife to complain about domestic violence than for an ordinary woman. The MOD scored exactly one out of 10 in the survey.

What about the Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs? Well, one might say, "Look here, Vera. DEFRA is about badgers and windmills. What has that got to do with domestic violence?" However, there are special problems with domestic violence and its victims in rural areas. There will be no sexual assault referral centre and no refuge. To whom should victims complain? Their partner's GP will be their GP, and they can hardly get any confidential counselling. There are special difficulties for rural people who are victims of such violence, yet DEFRA scored zero out of 10.

Scariest of all, the Department for Education and Skills scored zero out of 10. The statistic I know best is that 30 per cent. of 15 and 16-year-old boys think that in certain circumstances, it is all right to hit a woman; and 17 per cent. of 15 and 16-year-old girls think so, too. However, the DFES has no strategy for educating about violence against women. I used to assert that violence against women was on the citizenship course, but I am not sure that it is at all.

To cut matters down to a manageable size, the issue that the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) raised about needing a television licence for each room in a refuge is also due to a lack of integrated thinking. It is not due to a lack of political will to make it easy for people in refuges to enjoy that comfort and amuse their children while they are in that unfortunate situation; it has happened because nobody has thought about it and the Home Office has not liaised with the Department that deals with television licences, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, to ensure that that knotty corner is knocked off.

Without a systematic and strategic plan throughout all Departments to deal with violence against women, many other factors will not be taken into consideration in exactly the same way. The WNC is going to conduct its survey of Departments annually, so Departments will know what is coming and they must be ready to improve and integrate.

It is good to see a lot of women present for the debate, but it is excellent to see a lot of men present to support it; I compliment them on the insightfulness of their contributions. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) in saying that we must strive to have this debate reinstated in the main Chamber. It looks like special pleading coming from the women; it looks like generous advocacy coming from the men. So may we ask for their support in that as well?

"Making the Grade" is an important report. The WNC was led by Margaret Prosser, the very woman who only recently led the women and work commission, which reported so emphatically and importantly about other aspects of women's inequality. What a great woman she is. She should keep up the good work.

4.37 pm

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Many Members have given horrific examples of violence against women. They have also commented that it takes place within a general culture. I should like to make a few remarks about that second point.

[Helen Goodman]

I find the sexualisation of our culture and the normalisation of the sex industry most alarming. The growth of pornography and anti-female lyrics in the pop music industry is a major influence on young people. Its impact on male attitudes towards women and on women's internalisation of negativity is serious. Men are believing that there is a connection between sex and violence, and academic research has shown that they are acting out those fantasies in private. At the same time, women are being encouraged to believe that it is appropriate.

I do not want to detain the Chamber, so I shall provide just one example to illustrate my point. On the internet, one can buy a talking dartboard, shaped like a naked woman's torso, which will "squeal with delight" when hit. Object, a campaign group that analyses pornography, has received legal advice stating that the courts are highly unlikely to consider the product indecent under the Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981.

The Home Office is working to deal with extreme pornography, but the constant proliferation of what is coyly called soft pornography is also a problem. I am extremely unwilling to allow my daughter, who is nine, to do the things that her brother was able to do 10 years ago. I do not want her to go to the local newsagent to buy sweets or to collect the Sunday newspaper, because she will be bombarded with such images. I am sure that mothers and fathers throughout the country are similarly concerned about the impact of certain images on their children. Children internalise the images at a very early age, and girls are made to feel that the world is an unsafe place in which to live.

I hope very much that hon. Members will consider signing early-day motion 1622, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) and addresses the need to restore the top shelf to what it was. Some of us had a useful meeting yesterday afternoon in an all-party group that included men and women—Members of this and the other place. I hope that we can take early steps on that issue.

We need to think more deeply not only about the practical things but about more radical measures. We need to think about introducing a legal definition of pornography, which we do not have currently, and about the possibility of introducing gender-hatred legislation, because the language that is used about women and the images that are produced of women would be ruled to be totally unacceptable if they related to people of different races or different religions. We should extend the respect agenda to women.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of this very important debate: I was serving on a Standing Committee just along the Corridor. Luckily, it finished early, so I can take part in this debate, which is, sadly, vital.

As other hon. Members have said, domestic violence kills two women a week. In the view of Women's Aid, domestic violence is physical, sexual, psychological or financial violence that takes place within an intimate or family-type relationship and that forms a pattern of coercive and controlling behaviour. That can include forced marriage and so-called honour crimes, as other hon. Members have mentioned. Crime statistics and research show that domestic violence is gender-specific—it is most commonly experienced by women and perpetrated by men—and that any woman can experience domestic violence, regardless of race, ethnic or religious group, class, disability or lifestyle.

Domestic violence is repetitive and life-threatening; it can destroy the lives of women and children. We have heard horrific examples today. Domestic violence can also take place in lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender relationships and can involve other family members, including children. It is very common: research shows that it can affect one in four women in their lifetime, regardless of age, social class, race, disability or lifestyle. All forms of domestic violence—psychological, economic, emotional and physical—come from the abuser's desire for power and control over other family members or intimate partners.

British crime survey research found that women are most commonly sexually assaulted by men who they know. The researchers asked women about the last incident of rape that they had experienced since the age of 16. They found that 45 per cent. had been raped by current partners, 11 per cent. by former partners, 11 per cent. on dates, 16 per cent. by acquaintances and 10 per cent. by other intimates. Only 8 per cent. had been raped by strangers.

That brings me to a case raised with me by one of my constituents. She was raped by her then husband. I will not name her for obvious reasons, but she is a professional woman—a teacher. Her relationship with her husband was tumultuous. He was extremely jealous and domineering. I do not know the full history of the relationship and whether there had previously been domestic violence, but I feel that there must have been. The incident that she brought to me was the final straw. One night, her husband came home and she was asleep in bed. She awoke to find that she was being raped. There had been no prior argument or anything else that led to that—not that anything could give someone the right to rape another person.

My constituent chucked her husband out, started divorce proceedings and is now divorced. The police were involved. The Crown Prosecution Service said that she had a very good case and that it would probably result in a conviction. Unfortunately, about six months later, the CPS wrote to tell her that the case was being dropped because it would not result in a conviction. I am pursuing the case now, although obviously I cannot have the case tried. Various reasons were cited for dropping the case. One was that the woman was drunk on the night. Another was that she would not make a good witness, for whatever reason. Yet another was that there was a discrepancy between the date on which my constituent claimed the rape happened and the date that the police had written down. The police have said that they made a mistake in their notes. I am not a legal expert, but I am following that up with the police and the CPS. We will probably receive only an apology; the case will not go to court.

As I said, my constituent is a professional woman. She did not want to let the case drop and felt that she was capable of pursuing it. She took out a private prosecution. When she got to court, her barrister said to her, "This judge won't be sympathetic. Don't take the matter any further. Don't put yourself through this ordeal. The best we can go for is an injunction." The man lived nearby and was starting to intimidate her. She has obtained about three or four injunctions. They started at about 500 yd or metres, but the figure went down to 250 yd. The man keeps appealing and the decision keeps going in his favour. At that point, my constituent could go within about 250 yd of her house comfortably. I think that the judge overruled the injunction because the man claimed that his mum lived within the 500 yd and he wanted to be able to go and see her. The area was therefore reduced.

There is one working men's club—it is the only pub—within the 250 yd, and the man claimed that he wanted to have access to his mam and to be able to go to that pub because all his friends go there. That is totally not true; it is where all my constituent's friends and family go. However, the judge allowed him to go and see his mam and go to that club. Now, my constituent basically cannot go out for a drink at night and does not feel safe anywhere, because that was her safe zone. Her case raises big issues.

I have other interesting statistics. In the "Routes to Safety" study, 76 per cent. of separated women reported suffering post-separation violence. That is what my constituent now fears. I asked her whether she was still frightened of her ex-husband and what she felt he was after. I have never been raped, but obviously I appreciate why she would not want to be in the same room as him. She said, "No, it's more than that." She feels that he wants to see her dead—that the situation is as black and white as that.

The figures that I have back up such fears. Seventy-six per cent. of the women I was referring to were subjected to continued verbal and emotional abuse; 41 per cent. were subjected to serious threats towards themselves or their children; 23 per cent. were subjected to physical violence; 6 per cent. were subjected to sexual violence; and 36 per cent. stated that that violence was ongoing. That is after they have stopped living with the abusive partners; it is ongoing domestic abuse.

What is the cause of domestic violence? Abusers choose to behave violently to get what they want and to gain control. Their behaviour often originates from a sense of entitlement that is supported by sexist, racist, homophobic and other discriminatory attitudes. Domestic violence against women by men is caused by the misuse of power and control within a context of male privilege. Male privilege operates on an individual and societal level to maintain a situation of male dominance in which men have power over women and children. Other hon. Members touched on that, and it was fantastic to hear some men make that very point.

Domestic violence by men against women can be seen as a consequence of the inequalities that still exist in our society between men and women. Such inequalities are rooted in patriarchal traditions that encourage men to believe that they are entitled to power and control over their partners. Domestic violence is learned, intentional behaviour rather than the consequence of stress, individual pathology, substance use or a dysfunctional relationship. Perpetrators of domestic violence frequently avoid taking responsibility for their behaviour by blaming it on someone or something else, by denying it took place or by minimising it.

Research shows that violent men are most likely to perpetrate violence because of their own sexual jealousy and possessiveness. which were the factors in my constituent's case, because they demand domestic services, or to demonstrate male authority. Some men believe that sex is another type of domestic service that they can demand. Violent men will typically justify or ignore their behaviour by minimising the violence—by saying that it was just a slap or that it was not that bad—by justifying their behaviour to themselves and blaming the victim, by denying that the violence happened or even by refusing to talk about it.

Can alcohol or drugs cause domestic violence? Many people who drink too much or take drugs do not abuse their partners or family members. Likewise, abuse does not occur exclusively when an abuser is drunk or under the influence of drugs. The use of alcohol or drugs is therefore not the underlying cause of domestic violence.

Abusers who use alcohol or drugs may use them as an excuse for their behaviour, saying that they were drunk or do not remember. However, even if they generally do not remember what they did, it does not remove responsibility for their behaviour. There is never an excuse for domestic violence, and the causes of domestic violence are far more deep-rooted than simply being the effect of intoxication or alcohol or drug dependency. If an abuser is alcohol or drug dependent, it is important that the dependency is treated in tandem with the violent behaviour. Addressing one without the other is unlikely to prove successful.

Women who experience domestic violence may turn to alcohol or drugs as a form of escape from the violence. Sometimes, abusers will then use their partner's addiction as an excuse for their violent behaviour, saying that they have been provoked into using violence. Excuses such as these are used by the perpetrator to deflect responsibility from themselves and to put the focus or blame for their violence on to the victim. In such situations, it is vital that women receive the support they need, but also that the perpetrator is held accountable for their actions and not excused because of the woman's behaviour.

A study of 336 offenders convicted of domestic violence found that alcohol was a feature in 62 per cent. of offences and that 48 per cent. of offenders were alcohol dependent. Some say that domestic violence is caused by a lack of control. That is just not true. Domestic violence is about gaining control, not a lack of it. If an abuser is careful about when, where and to whom they are abusive, they show sufficient awareness and knowledge of their actions to indicate that they are not out of control.

So who is responsible for the violence? The abuser is, always. There is no excuse for domestic violence. The abuser has a choice whether to use violence, for which he is responsible and for which he should be held accountable, but he does not have to exercise that choice—he could choose instead to behave non-violently and foster a relationship built on trust, honesty, fairness and respect. The victim is never responsible for the abuser's behaviour.

[Mrs. Sharon Hodgson]

It is important that any intervention to address domestic violence prioritises the safety of survivors and holds the perpetrators accountable. Couple counselling or mediation is often seen as a way of addressing the problem. However, there are two significant problems with such an approach. First, there is a risk to the woman's safety, as asking her to discuss the violence with the perpetrator present may lead to later reprisal. Secondly, the approach assumes that the woman is in some way responsible or capable of altering the perpetrator's behaviour. Women's Aid therefore does not support the use of couple counselling or mediation in situations where domestic violence has occurred.

In addition to the individual costs associated with a loss of quality of life—and the loss of life itself, in some cases—domestic violence costs our society as a whole. The estimated total cost of domestic violence to society in monetary terms is £23 billion per annum. That figure includes an estimated £3.1 billion as the cost to the state, £1.3 billion as the cost to employers and £17 billion as the cost of individual human suffering.

I end by thanking Women's Aid, whose website I found most useful in researching my speech. I quote from that website:

"Everyone has the right to live free from abuse and fear."

We all know only too well that there will be women in this country and around the world tonight for whom that statement is just that—a statement, words—as they are living lives of abuse and fear. It is for those women that debates such as this one are vital. As all right hon. and hon. Members have shown by taking part in this debate, we shall all feel that we have not really made a difference until the statement I quoted becomes a reality.

4.56 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am pleased that the debate around international women's day has become something of a fixture. My first reaction on seeing the topic this year was slight disappointment, as I thought that it would be nice to celebrate the achievements of women for a change. That is something that we do not do very often, but then I thought a bit more and realised that this debate is important, as all aspects of it come up often in various Bills and Committees, but the reality in the daily lives of many women is that such subjects are difficult to talk about and still very much taboo.

We have had a wide-ranging discussion covering domestic violence, honour crimes, which we have not dealt with much, rape and trafficking. There was a mention in dispatches of female genital mutilation, which goes to show that not all violence against women is perpetrated by men. I shall start by speaking about domestic violence. The statistics have already been given. Every minute, somewhere in the UK the police receive a domestic assistance call. It is only when one starts to think about that that one realises that domestic violence is prevalent in many women's lives. Every year, 500,000 women are victims of domestic violence, and according to a Home Office report published in March 2005, "Domestic Violence: A National Report", only 7,000 of those 500,000 cases—1.4 per cent.—result in prosecution. It is clear that we still have a long way to go.

As this will probably be my last debate speaking on these matters for my party, I was tempted to have a go, but then I thought that that would be churlish. In fact, if one looks back eight years, progress has been made. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) has pointed out some of the problems, so I shall leave my adversarial comments at that and simply say that I echo some of her concerns that things are not as joined up as they could be.

It is interesting to note that domestic violence has a higher rate of repeat victimisation than any other crime When one talks to the police about this issue, they state clearly that many of the perpetrators of domestic violence are not only violent in the home. Sorting out domestic violence problems can result in some of the wider problems in society being sorted out as well.

One of the concerns that I have about a current changes in Government budgets is around the supporting people programme. Between April and September 2005, 82,000 people accessed services that were paid for by supporting people grants, and just over 10,000 of them—13 per cent.—had either a primary or secondary link to domestic violence. However, in the financial year 2006–07, the supporting people budget will be cut for the fourth year in a row, by approximately £30 million. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is on record stating that councils could expect cuts of up to 5 per cent. in 2007 and 2008. That is especially important, because Women's Aid has pointed out that since 2003 supporting people has been the main funding source for the provision of refuge-based domestic violence services and community-based domestic violence floating support services.

As various speakers have hinted, when local councils are faced with decisions on which services to cut domestic violence is, sadly, not very high on the list of priorities. It can appear to be a relatively easy target, because the victims are not the sort of people who generally want to make a fuss, because of the taboo. Also the nature of domestic violence is such that it starts with a psychological element and the women somehow think that it is their fault.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar picked up the concerns expressed in "Making the Grade", which was compiled by the End Violence Against Women Coalition. The only quotation from the report that I shall repeat is about the within Departments, so I am delighted to see that we have made a start on co-ordination with the two Ministers here today.

"picture of disarray and non-co-ordination"

One of the areas of most concern has been the low conviction rates for rape. Some hon. Members present here today served on the Committee that considered the Sexual Offences Act 2003. There were some good things in that Act, which, we all thought, changed the law for the better. It is therefore of some concern to learn of a case in December last year that received quite a lot of publicity, in which a judge halted a rape trial before the jury had heard all the evidence, because, he said:

"drunken consent is still consent".

That shows how difficult it is for women to see justice being done. The problem is that the judge did not seem to be aware of the change in the law. He did not seem to realise the implications of the 2003 Act, which lays down that if a woman says that she was raped while unconscious or stupefied, including through drink, the responsibility shifts to the man to explain why he thought she consented. That clearly did not happen in that case.

It has often occurred to me while pondering the wisdom of our judiciary that in many other areas of public life—particularly in the health service, where the consequences of a lack of professional development can be dire—there is a strong emphasis on continuing professional development. I wonder whether it would be a good idea to ensure that people trying cases are up to date and up to speed. I do not think that there is any mechanism to ensure that that happens and it might be worth considering, because such incidents send the wrong message to all women.

What has not been mentioned in the comments on rape is the phenomenon of drink spiking, which, according to one survey, 25 per cent. of younger women claimed to have experienced. Such incidents are often dismissed by saying, "No, it was the drink, it wasn't the drug," but someone very close to me had it happen to her. She was sensible enough to realise that something had happened, so she called her boyfriend in front of the people she was with and managed to get home. They did not know that her boyfriend would take an hour to get home, but she managed to get home and nothing happened. She cannot remember very much about the event; the drugs used often have that effect.

The problem has received scant attention from the Home Office—indeed, one of the initial studies on the subject was later found to have been highly influenced by somebody who was in the pay of the drugs company that produces one of the drugs that is most commonly used. If there is any work being done on the problem, it would be useful to have an update.

Linda Gilroy: The hon. Lady may be interested to know that the students' union at Plymouth university has done some pioneering work on the issue, raising awareness in the clubs and pubs in Plymouth. I would certainly commend such work to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart). I shall send her details if she is not already aware of it, because it is an interesting initiative. I agree with the hon. Lady that more work is needed on the issue.

Sandra Gidley: Certainly more awareness is needed, particularly in the period leading up to Christmas, with office parties and people going out with people who they do not know. Young women should perhaps be more alert, looking after each other and recognising the signs when such incidents occur.

Vera Baird: The Home Office made GHB, which is the drug the hon. Lady is talking about, unlawful. It was not unlawful before, but it is hard to control because it can be made out of things that can be bought in a shop and the recipe is on the internet.

Sandra Gidley: GHB is one of the drugs in question, but that was not the drug to which I was referring.

Many hon. Members raised the issue of trafficking. During the passage of the 2003 Act, Opposition Members tabled amendments on trafficking to support both the provision of safe houses—there was an experiment on that and I wonder whether there are any plans to expand it—and the cooling-off period, which has been introduced in countries such as Sweden. During a cooling-off period victims can stay in the country for a while before being deported—they are not returned immediately to their home town. There is evidence to show that such measures lead to an increase in convictions.

It is still not clear to me why the opportunity was not taken then to tie up the loose ends, so that the European convention on action against trafficking in human beings could have been ratified at an early stage. I would urge the Government not to be afraid of ratification, because Italy, which has a huge immigration problem, seems to be able to distinguish between immigration and trafficking quite successfully. There is a lot of work being done, even with users of prostitutes. That may seem odd, but users often build up relationships with trafficked girls and can be the ones who blow the whistle to the police.

I am glad that the general influence of pornography has been mentioned. Pornography is pervasive in our society, which as a liberal causes me great conflicts. The media and the press have greatly influenced our attitudes towards women. The increase in pornography is a puzzling trend, but what puzzles me even more is the number of women who appear to be willing participants, which, as an older feminist, I struggle to get my head round. Often they are bright young women who have other options but choose for some bizarre reason to go into jobs that are loosely associated—I use the word "loosely" advisedly—with the sex trade.

I was interested as a Member of Parliament to receive a flier addressed to my office for Spearmint Rhino—I did not take much notice; it might have been peppermint rhino. It was quite excited to be opening in Southampton, but I was amazed that it thought it appropriate to send me that flier and wondered how many male MPs had been lobbied in similar ways.

We have to change attitudes in schools. A lot of that is about assertiveness skills for women, as well as the attitudes of young men and young women. Waiting until the age of 11 is probably too late. We need to start on such work much earlier.

Finally, I was quite amused by the some of the anti-female comments that we have heard about. I do not know how many hon. Members have been in receipt of an e-mail from someone who seems to think that there is a terrible anti-men lobby out there. The belief seems to be based on a knife-holder, which is actually anti-gender—it is not possible to tell what sex it is. The e-mail also complained about a website where people can buy "boys are smelly" wristbands. All I would say is that if that were the worst thing that such men had to contend with, they should get a life, start supporting some of the initiatives and projects, and start campaigning against violence against women.

5.9 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): It is a great pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley). I did not know until she mentioned it at the beginning of her speech that this might be one of the last occasions on which she speaks for her party on this subject. In the absence of anybody else from her party to pay tribute to her—[Interruption.] I do apologise; the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) is, of course, here. Even though somebody else from her party is present to pay tribute to her, may I, on behalf of everybody in the Chamber, congratulate her on all the work that she has done on matters relating to women and equality during the past year or so? There has been much legislation on which many of us have worked together—I do mean together, rather than against one another. I hope that she will not be as successful in her next post as she has been in this one, but only because I might not agree with her on so many issues in future. She has certainly been very successful in this role, and we wish her well.

The very fact that we are having this debate is a big step forward; it is a positive way for the House to mark international women's day. Let me begin by apologising for the fact that while the Government have two Ministers on the Front Bench, I am alone. I should have been joined by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) but, unfortunately, he has been detained on jury service. That is pretty hard for a learned member of the Bar, so he has my sympathy. I particularly wanted to mention that, because while I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), I want to point out that I am not the only member of the Conservative Front Bench who is concerned about the issue, it is just that we are spread rather thinly, so I am the only one here.

There are many kinds of violence against women. Hon. Members have touched on several subjects this afternoon—and very eloquently. However, I want to use most of my time to speak about domestic violence. The very fact that we are talking about the subject openly and emphatically is a step towards eradicating it, because we are getting rid of the taboo about domestic violence, which has been considered a private matter between a man and women or other domestic partners in which others should not interfere. That attitude has prevailed for far too long and I am sure that that is why the statistics are so shocking.

Since I began to be involved in the subject, I have told many people that they can assume that between one in four and one in three women in any room they care to go into has been affected by domestic violence. When people stop and think about that they are truly shocked, and so they should be. For generations, if not since the beginning of time, women have put up with certain situations because they have had no way of dealing with them or getting out of them. They were, and still are, conditioned to think that being treated badly is just part of a woman's lot. It is not and it should not be, and the fact that we are discussing the subject now is an important step in the right direction.

Domestic violence is not just caused—as many have said this afternoon—by a quick burst of temper on the part of a man who is a bit annoyed about something. That is how people would have us believe that it happens. It is just as bad—worse in many cases—if the violence is the result of years of control through bullying, as several hon. Members have said, because mental and emotional abuse is often worse than straight physical abuse. Of course, there is usually a combination of all of those things.

Worst of all, women who are victims are usually made to feel that it is their fault, that they have to take responsibility for it, that they deserve it and that there is nothing that they can do about it. Of course, because respectability is so precious, women do not want to talk about it. They do not even tell their best friends or their families, because they feel responsible and ashamed. That is how men get away with domestic violence. I have to say that a small but significant amount of domestic violence is perpetrated by women against men. However, for the most part it is women who are abused.

At a meeting in Essex about domestic violence, I met the sister-in-law of a woman who had been murdered by her husband. That woman had known that she was going to die one day at the hands of her husband. She was trapped, and there was nothing that she could do about it. That was not because she had no money, or because she did not know what to do, but because she could not travel to work from a refuge, or go on earning money and keep her respectability and her position as a professional woman. If she had left home, she would have had to move her children out of school. There was too much to get over for her to get away, so she just kept taking the risk of staying with her husband, and eventually he killed her.

Most people who are in refuges are children, because children suffer even more from domestic violence than women do. Of course, as other hon. Members have said, a child's whole life can be affected. When I was a child, a little boy called Clifford lived down the road from us. He used to come and play with my younger brother. One day, Clifford was not there any more. Years later, I discovered that he had had to go and live with his grandparents because his father had murdered his mother—but of course we did not talk about it then; it was all hushed up. Nobody knew that behind the respectable façade of the lovely house in which they lived, such dreadful things were happening. Such things are still happening to one in four women in Britain today.

While mentioning children, I should say that the NSPCC's full stop campaign is relevant to the issue, because children learn that if it is acceptable to hit them when they have apparently done something wrong, then hitting is acceptable. Hitting is never acceptable in any circumstances, and that includes smacking.

Linda Gilroy: Does the hon. Lady agree that, as well as children, perhaps the most vulnerable group is older people? Those of us who are active in the all-party group are concerned that that should be discussed.

Mrs. Laing: I certainly do, and I am glad that I gave way to the hon. Lady. I was going to make that point later, and she is absolutely correct. When one looks into the subject it becomes more and more frightening.

Women's Aid and Refuge, to which I pay tribute, are doing a brilliant job, but I must ask the Minister for Women and Equality whether the Government have any plans to provide financial support for the work of those two organisations. Last year they received 250,000 calls to their helpline, and they simply do not have the funds to enable them to keep the service going, although we know how vital it is. Last Christmas, I organised a poster campaign to publicise the refuge helpline number, so I hope that a few of those 250,000 calls came as a result of my little posters. That was a small effort, but I said at the time that if just one life is saved, or one child does not have to see his father beating up his mother, it will have been worth while.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) mentioned domestic violence courts. For the sake of brevity, all I will say is that I hope that they work.

Practical points were made by the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire and others, about television licences, for example, and such matters as local authorities classifying women who have fled domestic violence as deliberately homeless. That is ridiculous, but many local authority housing departments still do not re-house women in that position, because they consider them to be deliberately homeless. I hope that the message will go out across the country that that appalling attitude is not acceptable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough mentioned trafficking, slavery, prostitution and other such tragic cases, as did other hon. Members who spoke about the international situation. In many countries, violence against women is acceptable and normal and it is not easy for us to make a difference there. However, the fact that it is not easy does not mean that we should not continue to try.

Recently, in one of those big surveys of women in public life, a magazine asked me, "What do women want?", to which my immediate answer was, "To be treated with respect." The interviewer said, "Oh, what a very unusual answer. Everyone else said, 'Shoes and handbags and diamonds.'"

Meg Munn: We want those too.

Mrs. Laing: Yes, I agree. We want the shoes, handbags and diamonds as well, but I would happily give up those things to ensure being treated with respect. All the women in the Chamber are usually treated with respect, but every woman deserves that.

Violence against women is not a joking matter, and I am pleased that international women's day has provided a focus for this important issue. We have won many battles, but there are many more to go. I am pleased to see a general consensus across the political divide this afternoon.

5.20 pm

The Minister for Women and Equality (Meg Munn): I shall not take interventions, because hon. Members have given me a great deal to think about and I want to respond to everybody's comments. If anybody thinks that I am not about to respond to their points, they should please hang on, and if I have not responded by the final 30 seconds, I shall do so then if I can.

This debate is extremely important, and it has been excellent. To have 14 Back-Bench speakers as well as the Front-Bench speakers is a tribute to hon. Members and the interest that has rightly been paid to this issue.

The Government have a comprehensive body of work that is being undertaken across government, and we are joining up our approach. We recently launched a media campaign to raise awareness about the issues, and policy work is properly joined up at the centre. Part of preparing for international women's day and the decision to focus on violence against women, which chosen by the Ministers as the focus for this year, has led to a significant amount of work being done to pull together exactly what is going on.

That is the volume of work going on across government; there is quite a thick book of it. I draw hon. Members attention to some of the issues that have been taken up in the past few years. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary referred to significant milestones; there are almost two pages of significant milestones, although those achieved before 1999 take up only a third of a page. As the rest of the two pages covers milestones since then, hon. Members can see that that work is picking up, and rightly so, because we will have to concentrate a great deal more on this area.

I should like to convey my best wishes to the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley). She and I have been involved together in many debates on many issues. I am pleased that there has been cross-party working on this matter and that real progress has been made in the work that we do together on women's issues.

Looking to the future, the Home Office will publish later this month a new comprehensive and transparent domestic violence report that will include greater detail on the national delivery plan and other cross-governmental work. Significant steps have been taken in relation to domestic violence, such as the production in 2003 of "Safety and Justice", the Government's proposals on domestic violence, which led to a range of work.

The work of specialist domestic violence courts was mentioned by several hon. Members. Some 25 such courts will be in place by April 2006 as part of a national programme, and there will be at least one such court area in every region. I believe that Plymouth is being supported to gain such a court by the national programme, which will please my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy).

We are seeing the benefits of those measures. Recent data show that during the Caerphilly domestic violence court pilot, guilty pleas went up from 21 per cent. to 27 per cent., and they averaged 61 per cent. by September 2005. Convictions also went up from 8 per cent. to 19 per cent., and they have now reached 32 per cent. Victim withdrawals fell from 53 per cent. to 27 per cent., and then down to 17 per cent. in the further phase, so we are recognising the value of such measures. Several hon. Members mentioned advocacy, which we value and want to see more of.

The Government have put in place a best value performance indicator for local authorities in relation to domestic violence. That is important, because we are trying to ensure that there are services throughout the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton noted that, at times, there have been few services in certain areas. We want this issue to be given priority, because as many hon. Members have emphasised, this issue is not on one side; it is a huge part of violent crime, and it should be central to the safety plans in each area. There are important indicators. I do not have time to go into all of them, but I can say that local authorities have to consider domestic violence issues such as having a minimum of one refuge place per 10,000 population. They must also have a multi-agency strategy to tackle domestic violence, which is developed in partnership with other areas.

In relation to the future of refuges, I am happy to make the commitment to the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) that I will ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to consider changing the rules. I shall write to the hon. Lady about that.

I am pleased to say that the issues relating to the courts are being given serious consideration not only by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, but by Baroness Scotland, who is today visiting the Cardiff specialist domestic violence court and women's safety unit. I am sure that she will be lobbied on the issues raised by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan). The Croydon pilot focused particularly on matters of criminal and civil domestic violence courts, which has been raised today. I hope that the pilot will give us more evidence on which we can take these matters forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) referred to homicide reviews, which are an enormously important aspect of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004. Domestic violence and homicide reviews will come into force across the country from April.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) raised the important matter of encouraging strategies to ensure that victims can stay in the family home wherever possible. Several projects are being taken forward in relation to that, such as sanctuary schemes involving heightened security and co-ordinated support from police and the wider population. Guidelines on establishing such schemes are being drafted by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. We plan to publish a brief, targeted consultation document on those issues.

The funding of the national 24-hour freephone domestic violence helpline, which is delivered in partnership with Women's Aid and Refuge, is enormously important. I am pleased to confirm that there will be £1 million of Government funding for the helpline over three years, which will lever in £1 million in match funding from Comic Relief.

I shall deal briefly with issues of sexual offending and rape. Obviously, a great deal is being done through the Sexual Offences Act 2003, and the Government are committed to improving the legal system by tackling low conviction rates in rape and sexual assault cases and through the rape action plan 2002. There was a stock-take of the plan in the summer of last year, whose results will be made known soon so that we can ensure that lessons are learned from it. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) made some important points about how the lessons that are learnt in some situations, such as in the domestic violence courts, can be applied to rape. We need to do more such joining up.

On finance, the women and equality unit has had discussions with the Treasury about the 2007 comprehensive spending review to ensure that gender and equality form a cross-cutting theme throughout the review and to ensure that bids from other Departments are gender sensitive.

On human trafficking, a public consultation is ongoing. We are anticipating developing an action plan. Again, I want to stress the UK's work, particularly during our presidency, in forming the EU action plan on trafficking and ensuring that the issue is highlighted. Indeed, the range of legislation that we have to deal with the matter is really important.

I want my final words to be about respect. A lot was said, quite rightly, about attitudes. We should take this matter forward as part of the respect agenda. It is about what we do in schools, about changing attitudes and about ensuring that there is proper respect for women and for girls. Only when that respect is in place will we finally be able to put behind us these dreadful crimes of violence against women.

9.30 am

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am pleased to have secured this Adjournment debate. It is pertinent, particularly as it comes after what I describe as the sacking of the chief executive of the NHS, and after the announcement only last week that the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS trust faces an £8.1 million deficit this year and is engaged in a financial recovery programme that will involve the sacking of 300 staff and the loss of vital services to the trust at three hospitals that cover Cornwall, two of which are in my constituency. I also raised the issue of acute hospital funding on 6 April last year—the debate can be found in columns 1545 to 1554 of Hansard.

I should declare an interest, as my wife is a nurse in the local trust. I should also say by way of background that I welcome the increase in NHS resources. I am not mealy-mouthed about the substantial resources that the Government have put into the NHS since 1999. However, many of us are asking what those resources have achieved. There have been cuts in some of the headline figures in respect of waiting lists, but serious questions must be asked about the effectiveness of the use of resources in the NHS.

The sacking of Sir Nigel Crisp last week demonstrated the seriousness of the situation that many hundreds of trusts will face towards the end of this financial year. Arguably, Ministers are more exposed now that he is gone than they were before, and his departure raises questions about why so many primary care trusts, and acute trusts in particular, are facing such high deficits.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I apologise for arriving after the hon. Gentleman began his speech. Will he speculate on whether the Government hold any responsibility for what happens at the local level in the health service? They have a propensity to say that it is all a matter for the trusts and PCTs, but they appoint every member of the executive boards of those trusts and PCTs.

Andrew George: Given the hon. Gentleman's last remark, one could say that his question is rhetorical. The fact is that the Secretary of State appoints all the boards and sets the targets, guidelines and parameters in which each trust operates. I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that trusts are, in effect, agents of the Government—they are not separate from the Government in any way. The Government cannot pretend that trusts are remote bodies over which they have little control, or simply pass the buck and not accept responsibility. I shall further embellish that point later. I do not take the view of those who would like to secure a ministerial scalp before lunch that somehow Ministers must be accountable for the loss of a paper clip in some distant outpost, but they must be accountable for important matters such as the fundamental management of NHS finance. The chief executive lost his job over that issue, and, as Ministers are now exposed, it is the Minister's duty to be accountable.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government's swerve at the last minute, which involved top-slicing the budgets of primary care trusts by between 1.5 per cent. and, at one stage, 6 per cent., and the withdrawal over three years of the purchaser protection adjustment caused financial chaos across the country for which Ministers are directly responsible?

Andrew George: The Minister will have heard that question, so there is no need for me to embellish it. I am sure that she will take it on board and address it when she replies to the debate.

The fundamental question is, where has all the money gone? We know that about half of it has gone on general practitioner, consultant and "Agenda for Change" salary increases, but one must ask where all the rest of it has gone. We also must ask whether the culture of target setting improves performance and patient care or simply adds to administrative complexity.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): As the husband of a nurse, does not the hon. Gentleman welcome what the Government have done, particularly since 1999, in addressing the low pay that bedevilled nursing in particular and, to a certain extent, other clinical disciplines in the NHS? Surely that was long overdue and welcome.

Andrew George: Of course it was welcome, but one could set a benchmark against which pay increases would be assessed. GPs work nine-to-five, five days a week yet get five times as much as hospital nurses, who deal with stressful situations and work antisocial hours—weekends, nights and so on. Whether they should receive one fifth of what GPs do is a matter of parity within the NHS, which obviously needs to be sorted out. There is also the question of regrading, which happens whenever pay increases come along. Nurses are often downgraded rather than given a salary increase. The picture is not quite as rosy as the hon. Gentleman describes, although I agree that the general increase—the general trend—is welcome. I thought that I had welcomed it earlier.

The situation is dire indeed in Cornwall, which I mentioned earlier. Right hon. and hon. Members would be surprised if I did not mention it a few times. There are significant overspends this year, but that is not new: the PCTs inherited deficits from their predecessor organisations. The question is whether the services provided in Cornwall as a result of all this extra money being spent—more than the Government had in fact budgeted for—are better than in other parts of the country, or whether there is some other explanation. Also, what future opportunities will there be to review the appropriateness of the Government's funding formula for NHS trusts?

[Andrew George]

The situation in Cornwall is serious. There are concerns about how things are being managed, and there is a lack of confidence in the local NHS. Last year, I was at Helston protesting with the local community about the cutting of 10 of 34 beds in that vital community hospital, which serves the remote Lizard peninsula. On Tuesday last week, I was complaining to the chief executive of the Royal Cornwall Hospitals Trust that there were 14 ambulances, nearly the whole provision for Cornwall, queued up outside the front door of accident and emergency at Treliske in Truro, and there were no beds available within the trust to admit patients, yet a day later the trust was talking about a deficit and the need to sack staff.

It is clear that the situation is untenable. It demonstrates that the service is in crisis. Managers go through an admirable coping process and say that everything is under control, but it is not. There are some very serious questions about the future financing of hospital services in places such as Cornwall which need to be addressed. I do not bear any criticism of front-line clinical staff, who are clearly hard-working, dedicated professionals, but local people worry that their service is not being run in the best interest of patients. What is the problem? Is it a failure of staff, of management, of funding or of the Government? We need to understand how funds are allocated to PCTs, and I know that for many this is a rather turgid subject.

Since the national health service was established in 1948, a variety of formulae have been employed to attempt to achieve fair and equitable funding. The present system can be traced back to the resource allocation working party created by the then Department of Health and Social Security in 1976. The working party introduced the concept of weighted capitation, and current allocations in England are weighted in respect of four separate components in NHS funding: hospital and community health services, drugs and prescriptions, general practice infrastructure and HIV/AIDS.

Hospital and community health services account for 82 per cent. of the overall spend, and a population head count is weighted for each PCT, according to age, emergency ambulance cost adjustment, need and market forces. Some, like the emergency ambulance cost adjustment, account for just 0.5 per cent. of the overall allocation. Need indices are not favourable to rural areas. For example, Cornwall, which is the poorest objective 1 area in the country, has significantly less funds according to its need index than the two other, wealthier objective 1 areas—Merseyside and South Yorkshire—and those regions are far more urban than Cornwall.

I will not go into detail about all the factors that go into weighing the matter up, but rural matters tend to lose out on the need index. The biggest impact is the higher weighting given to the market forces factor. The three Cornwall PCTs collectively tend to be at the bottom of the market forces factor league table, which contains 303 PCTs across the country. At present, Torbay is at the bottom, with the West of Cornwall PCT in my constituency second to bottom. However, the table is supposed to reflect local wage rates and other market factors.

I fully accept that all Members engage in a certain amount of special pleading with the Minister for the formula to be skewed in a direction that would benefit their own constituency, and I suppose that I am guilty of that. However, there is a fundamental issue of parity in this case. The market forces factor has a heavy influence on the overall funding allocation and it seems bizarre that the consideration that seems to have the greatest impact on the overall allocation of the market forces factor applies in circumstances where, as the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, the majority of the funds are spent according to national pay structures.

In any case, there is a lower staff turnover in areas such as Cornwall. The National Audit Office report in 2004, which examined the cause of deficits in Cornwall's PCTs, said:

"There is low staff turnover, with many staff at the top of their payscale."

In fact, in circumstances where Cornwall is at the bottom of the earnings league table for both the public and the private sector, those employed in the NHS tend to be found at the upper end of their pay scale. If anything, we should be getting more money to reflect that, rather than less.

Of course, that still does not justify the abnormality of the heavy weight placed on the market forces factor at the expense of all other factors. For example, the geography of Cornwall means that it cannot call on emergency services from the north, west or south at times of crisis, and that should be factored into its emergency service planning, its ambulance service, its accident and emergency services and the vital casualty service at West Cornwall hospital in Penzance. Regarding access to services, Cornwall's geography means that it is bordered by only one authority to the east, so the capacity to share resources and achieve economies of scale in that way is very limited. The acute trust's provision of services has to operate at 13 different sites, as well as running the three other services.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman share a concern about the new arrangements for out-of-hours services in Cornwall? He will know about the matter better than me, but when I was in Truro just over a year ago, one of the integrated factors there was that the call services for NHS Direct, the ambulance service and the out-of-hours service could operate together. The letting of a contract for out-of-hours services away from KernowDoc will run the risk of further disintegration of emergency services, when we should be moving in the opposite direction by trying to achieve greater integration, at least in terms of commissioning. That seems not to be happening in Cornwall.

Andrew George: It is certainly true that there has been enormous surprise and concern about the loss of the contract from KernowDoc. Serco, a company that does not have a tremendous track record so far—I understand it has just started running an out-of-hours service in the Cardiff area—has successfully bid for the out-of-hours contract. I understand the concerns regarding how streamlining or joint working with other out-of-hours services, such as NHS Direct, will be co-ordinated under the new regime, but many GPs who will be called on to support that service have yet to be convinced that the new arrangements are adequate. In fact, they may add further to the administrative complexity of the service.

To return to the issue of the market forces factor, the King's Fund report in 2004 cites its chief economist John Appleby, who, in issue 114 of the Health Service Journal, said:

"While the principle of adjusting purchasers' allocations and providers' prices to take account of unavoidable differences in cost is clearly sound, there is a question of how to do it."

He went on to say that the market forces factor

"is not the perfect solution to the issue of unavoidable cost variations".

That is why I am rather surprised that the Government have not taken into account other geographical factors of the type that I described. There are issues of economies of scale because it is clear that in areas such as Cornwall which have problems of remote rurality one cannot sacrifice accessibility by putting all services into one major centre. The unit costs are inevitably going to be higher if there are more smaller community hospitals and other services of the type that I described. There are bound to be higher travel costs. Research has shown that rural staff tend to travel two and a half times further than urban-based staff—that seems rather a low figure—and higher levels of unproductive time as well as cost prevail as a result. Therefore, staff-to-patient ratios need to be higher.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, without recognition of his point about rurality and the additional costs of having centres in rural areas, where inevitably the unit cost per treatment will be higher, payment by results could have a devastating effect on rural services, such as community hospitals?

Andrew George: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, and I shall come on to my concerns about that particular approach taken by the Government.

When we take into account all those concerns and the need for a skills mix in smaller centres, it is no wonder that the service is struggling financially. Is Cornwall receiving better treatment than the rest of the country because of the benefits of overspend, and are managers being over-generous with their resources? At the same time, ambulance response times in Cornwall, particularly for category A calls, are not very good. In fact, they are among the lowest in the country. Sub-specialties tend to be further away. Often they are in Bristol or elsewhere, 200 or 300 miles away. The accident and emergency service often involves queues outside the hospital. It is not working properly, and there are fewer diagnostic facilities in Cornwall. Often patients have to travel for them, and there is still only one CT scanner.

Mr. Turner: The hon. Gentleman is being very generous in allowing so many interventions.

Andrew George: Possibly too generous.

Mr. Turner: I certainly should not agree with that.

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in response to my question a few days ago, the Minister conceded that the funding to provide patients with a choice of five hospitals should recognise the cost of travel, otherwise it would benefit the rich and not the poor? Does the hon. Gentleman think that it ought to be taken into account in Cornwall as the Minister said it ought in the Isle of Wight?

Andrew George: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I was not going to cover the frankly diversionary issue of choose and book, and the expensive computer and administrative system that will need to be put in place for what is a fatuous choice for people in remote areas. It is quite absurd. Most people in my area want to be treated, and treated well, in their local hospital, for which they have enormous loyalty and respect. Instead of the resources going into administrative procedures, they want them to be spent in their local hospital, which is often struggling because of the lack of those resources.

What numerical impact does the market forces factor have on a place such as Cornwall? According to the table I mentioned earlier, on which Cornwall is 11 per cent. below the national average as far as the market forces factor is concerned, the calculation made by the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust showed that if Cornwall were just 4 per cent. below the national average, the trust would earn an extra £10 million and the primary care trust would earn £4 million. At a stroke, it would remove the deficit and put the NHS trust into credit. It demonstrates just how important the market forces factor is.

In a debate last year, the then Under-Secretary of State for Health with responsibility for community, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), said in response to me that "if it is clear that the formula allocation is not working for some reason, it will be reviewed."—[Official Report, 6 April 2005; Vol. 432, c. 1554.]

I hope that the Minister accepts that there are serious concerns today about how the allocation operates.

In the national context, we must consider more widely why funding crises affect a quarter or more of NHS trusts. There is bureaucracy, and there is a large number of chief executives. Even allowing for Sir Nigel Crisp's intervention last summer, when he sought to amalgamate many PCTs, 13 chief executives still need to come together to obtain a strategic view of health services in Cornwall. That includes social services, all PCTs and the various trusts that serve the Isles of Scilly and Cornwall. At the end of the PCT amalgamation process, all we have ended up with is too few chief executives—not a big change at all.

David Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way yet again. Is not he struggling to make a case for a national funding crisis? We are dealing with perhaps £800 million, which is approximately what the Chancellor of the Exchequer raises from taxation every 12 hours. If a large public service such as the NHS is within 1 per cent. of the framework set for it, it is evidence of a service in neither meltdown nor acute crisis. Some tuning is needed, however, particularly at local level in the quartile of PCTs that have the greater problems.

Andrew George: That is very brave. I have already said that I welcome the money; the question is, how is it being spent? According to the Department's own figures, the number of managers since 1997 has increased by 68 per cent., while the number of nurses—welcome, indeed—has increased by 23 per cent. We have to identify where the money is going, and it appears to be going to management to feed the complex bureaucratic system that the Government have set up.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew George: No, I will not.

On top of the complex funding mechanisms and the ball and chain of the market forces factor, Cornwall faces another factor: owing to the way that resource accounting and budgeting works, when Cornwall goes into deficit, it receives less money in the following year by the same amount as its current deficit, meaning that it must then run forward weighed down by two balls and two chains. The whole system is bizarre.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman has been generous in giving way. Does he share with me the view that, contrary to the contention of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), the nature of the financial problem is the sheer volatility and uncertainty experienced by trusts? Last year, the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust had £26 million of planned and unplanned support; this year, the strategic health authority has put in further support. The authority's own report shows that the forecast deficit deteriorated from £11.9 million for the whole SHA from month nine, the end of December, to £23.5 million at the end of month 10. The situation is deteriorating seriously. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire may call it tinkering or trimming, but the reduction of 300 jobs at that trust is serious.

Andrew George: I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will not mind that, having taken so many interventions, I have taken so long. It is important to tease out the issues.

It is true that as the Government, through the Secretary of State, appoint the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust board and chief executive, they are responsible for the climate in which the board operates and the decisions that it takes. The Secretary of State should face those 300 people to explain to them that they are losing their jobs because of the direct relationship between that extremely bad news and the decisions that she takes.

If I had time, I could explain why payment by results has a distorting effect, adds to trusts' administrative costs and does not help with greater efficiencies. The target culture also has a distorting impact. I understand that we must seek incentives to meet the need for desirable outcomes, but hitting targets often means missing the point. Although performance against targets seems okay, actions taken have been at variance with the intention of those goals. Ambulance waiting times outside accident and emergency units show that patients are not brought inside because of the fear that they will reach the four-hour waiting time limit. An admissions netherworld has been created in which people are taken out of accident and emergency units and put into clinical decisions units before they are eventually admitted. I am not sure that those situations are entirely clinically acceptable.

The target culture also distorts clinical priorities and patient safety. Ambulance response time targets are met by co-responders and volunteers. That is fine, and we appreciate the efforts of those volunteers, but often that is simply a ploy by which to address the need to meet ambulance response time targets. Targets also encourage a culture of cynicism and manipulation of data, as shown in the article by Gwyn Bevan and Christopher Hood in the British Medical Journal on 18 February this year. The target culture creates additional bureaucracy, as shown by a consultant in my constituency, Alastair Paterson. He treated all his serious cancer patients immediately, without a waiting list, but he was told last year that he had to create a waiting list—more unnecessary bureaucracy.

All that raises questions, and I have given the Minister notice of some of the issues that I shall raise. In my view, local authorities, because of the budgetary constraints and strictures on them, are, in effect, agents of Government. If that is true, certainly primary care trusts and acute trusts are agents of Government.

How can we explain the overspend in Cornwall? What assessment have the Government and the Minister made of the appropriateness of the funding formula for places such as Cornwall? What opportunity will there be to vary the formula? If the problem is management incompetence, the Secretary of State should step in, but if the problem is not incompetence or bad management, there must be another explanation, which must include questions of formula funding. Does the Minister accept that some of the largest proportionate deficits are experienced in the poorest regions? Does she accept that targets in respect of the new so-called private sector disciplines have an impact in terms of increased management costs?

The situation in Cornwall is extremely serious. I am sure that the Minister understands that 300 people will lose their jobs. Patients in Cornwall, who need better services and better access to services, need proper answers. The mayor's parlour campaign team in Cornwall is asking for a review of health spending in Cornwall. I hope that the Minister will consider these questions seriously. The problem is not only national; in some areas, there is a particular focus and a particular acute need. The acute need in Cornwall needs to be addressed by the Government undertaking a review of funding and spending and of the provision of hospital and acute services.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. David Amess (in the Chair): Order. I shall begin to call Opposition spokesmen at 10.30 am. Many hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, so unless speeches are extremely short, there will be widespread disappointment. I call Tony Baldry.

10.3 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) has done us all a great service today. The Minister will go through her Division Lobby and talk to her colleagues, but she needs to note the fact that, on the Labour Benches generally, there is not enormous concern about the NHS, as is evidenced by the fact that there are very few Labour Members in this Chamber today. That is not because they are uninterested in the subject, but because of the way in which the Government have skewed the formulas and the fact that we now live in two Englands. That so many colleagues are present from the south, the centre, the west and the east of England shows that the NHS, in parts of the country, is in serious difficulties. In Oxfordshire, for example, we received only 85 per cent. of the average of national spending on the NHS.

I shall ask the Minister specific questions. The Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust faces a £15 million deficit for this financial year. The strategic health authority, at the behest of the Secretary of State, sent in the accountants, the turnaround team. That team concluded that there was no financial mismanagement at the trust—indeed, no incompetence whatever—but that the deficit arose because of "over-trading". The deficit did not become apparent until halfway through the financial year. If it was caused by over-trading, that over-trading did not become apparent until halfway through the financial year. Who is responsible for that? Is it the PCTs, which are the commissioners? Is it the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust? Should it have known that it was over-trading, should the Thames Valley strategic health authority have had mechanisms in place to see what was going on in a key trust, or should the Department itself have known that something untoward was going on?

What do Ministers and their financial advisers mean by "over-trading"? Surely it means simply that GPs have been referring patients on the waiting list to the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust list for perfectly legitimate treatment and operations. How will Ministers deal with such "over-trading"? We have seen that, in part, they are dealing with it through the rather bizarre system called the clinical liaison advisory service, which is, in effect, second-guessing GPs' referrals. That means that the system is trying to limit the number of people who can have access to hospital treatment in Oxfordshire.

Today is Tuesday 14 March. The end of the financial year is only days away, but we still do not know how the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust will save £15 million—we have absolutely no idea. I wrote to the chief executive, Trevor Campbell Davis, some two weeks ago, asking whether he could give some indication as to how, between now and the end of the financial year, he intended to save that money. As of yet, I do not have a response. I think that that indicates that the sum is so significant that the savings can be made only through large-scale closure of wards, large-scale reductions in services and very considerable postponement of operations. Whose responsibility is it to ensure that the books of the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust are brought back into balance? Is it the responsibility of the chief executive of the trust or is it the responsibility of the chief executive of the Thames Valley strategic health authority?

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Baldry: I will not give way because quite a lot of colleagues want to speak.

We experience hit after hit in Oxfordshire. Only this week we were told that, under the purchasing parity formula in the NHS, we will lose £4.5 million. That presumably means that the single PCT that will emerge in Oxfordshire in the summer will have £4.5 million less to spend next year. Some Labour Members consider such sums to be trivial. Actually, for a trust that is having to save £15 million of unplanned spending, these slash-and-burn cuts always happen not in the most rational way but in such a way that the largest amount of money can be saved in the shortest time, and that often damages health care considerably.

We have yet to see the worst in Oxfordshire, because we have yet to know where the cuts will fall. My real concern is that, in a sense, this issue has nothing to do with the total sum of money going into the NHS. The Minister should reflect on this. The failures that occurred in Oxfordshire were failures of mechanisms. How was it that it took until halfway through the financial year for anyone to realise that anything untoward was happening? What was happening was not really untoward. The Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS trust was simply doing what it was meant to be doing: treating lots of patients. It is a major teaching hospital and research centre of excellence and it will always treat a large number of people. We all need to know from the Minister what mechanisms will be put in place to stop the type of crisis that I have described recurring year after year.

My final point is that the Thames Valley strategic health authority this year had to find, quite justifiably, an extra £15 million for Milton Keynes because the census did not take account of the fact that Milton Keynes had grown so fast. If the authority had had that extra £15 million, it would not have had to raid its reserves and borrowings to bail out Milton Keynes. It would have had some money that it could legitimately have used to help the Oxfordshire health economy to get back into balance this year. Of course, it must get back into balance, but perhaps it could have done so from a position of stability, rather than going into next year with £15 million of cuts from this year to sort out, as well as having to make substantial reductions in activity next year to avoid the "over-trading" position that we are in this year. I should be grateful if the Minister could answer those points today or write to me.

10.11 am

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the debate and congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing it.

The background to the deficits in the NHS is Britain's transformation as an economic power. The previous Conservative Administration took this country from its status as the sick man of Europe and an economic basket case to, in 1997, the status of the most powerful economy in Europe—more powerful than any other in the area. That provided an unprecedented opportunity to transform not only health outcomes but outcomes in a welter of policy areas that would affect the most vulnerable and the weakest in society.

The health opportunity—the opportunity to transform our health care—was, I think, particularly great. To give the Government credit, as other hon. Members have, it could be said that perhaps it has taken a Labour Government to make the record investments in the NHS that have been made, notwithstanding the large increases in spending above inflation that took place under the Conservative Government; but how has the opportunity been used? How has the transformation of the British economy that was brought about by the previous Conservative Government and inherited by the present Government been used to improve health outcomes? Unfortunately, despite their being one of the Government's key targets, health inequalities have in many cases widened and worsened despite the record sums that have been available thanks to the transformation of the economy.

The Government's report, "Tackling Health Inequalities", said that the gap in life expectancy between the bottom fifth and the population as a whole widened by 2 per cent. for males and by 5 per cent. for females between 1997–99 and 2001–03. It goes on to deal with the gap in the infant mortality rate between the poorest and the general population, which was 19 per cent. higher for the poorest in 2001–03 compared to 13 per cent. in 1997–99.

The NHS, which is now going into crisis, has had record spending put into it, but the very group for which one would have thought the Labour Government would most make a difference—and indeed they promised that they would make a difference to that group—has been let down. In fact, Danny Dorling, professor of human geography at the university of Sheffield, has said:

"This is the first Labour government that has failed to narrow the gap. It is astonishing after eight years and making reducing health inequality a key target that we are in this position."

Not only is the health service now in financial crisis, with the chief executive forced out ahead of his own timetable, and not only is it recognised that there are hundreds of job losses around the country, but we actually have wider health inequalities at a time of record spending.

This is a true financial crisis. Arguments that it is less than 1 per cent. of the spend are not matched by the reality on the ground, or by the top-slicing that hon. Members have already referred to, which has effectively punished those who have managed to balance their books. That is a direct result of the way in which the Government have interfered, using target culture and central interference in the NHS.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stuart: I am always delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but just before I do perhaps I may quote the chairman of the British Medical Association's consultants committee. The Minister may find it harder to dismiss his comments than she does to suggest that Opposition Members are trying to score points for no purpose. The chairman, Dr. Paul Miller, said:

"It is hard to understand why at a time when the government has invested unprecedented funding in the health service, trusts may have to lay off staff and close wards . . . Something is going terribly wrong"—

I can understand why the Minister does not want to listen when she hears this from the chairman of the consultants committee—

"when patients pay the price for these financial problems and the government's lack of joined-up thinking".

That is what the professionals think, and I am interested now to hear from the ever-loyal hon. Gentleman.

David Taylor: I did not recognise that description, but I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I want to challenge the suggestion by his Front-Bench colleague that I described the current position as trivial for the trusts involved. The key point that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members are bringing out is not the burgeoning of an NHS bureaucracy, which is often the butt of attacks by Opposition Members, but the chronic under-management, over many years, of parts of the NHS and, indeed, the dire need for talented public sector accountants and others involved in information and communications technology. I declare an interest as a member of both professions. Is that not the issue, rather than the construct that the hon. Gentleman is trying to sell to the House at the moment?

Mr. Stuart: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for suggesting that he is ever loyal, which, as some of my colleagues have pointed out, is not true. None the less, he is doing a very loyal job today and putting a brave face on a situation that is almost impossible to defend. We have had a 68 per cent. increase in the number of managers in the NHS, dwarfing the number of clinical front-line staff. It is only in a target-driven, centrally directed and bureaucratic NHS that we need such huge numbers of managers. People want decent local hospitals in which the local management, who are appreciated, do not fill in endless forms and reports-back to meet artificial Government targets, but focus on their local population.

That is the answer. Because of the central controls driven by the centralist state, we have cricked-neck policing and cricked-neck health care. Managers are unable to look down and provide answers to the needs of the local population. Instead, they are for ever turning their necks to look up as they feel their chains being pulled by Ministers; and as the panic increases in the Department in question, the yanks on the chain increase too. It may be hard for some hon. Members to imagine—at least not without pleasure—the Minister playing with a chain in that way. [Interruption.] I am getting into dangerous territory and will rapidly move away from it. If the Minister wants to intervene, I should be grateful. In fact, I should be grateful if anyone would.

There is a growth in inequalities. There is a financial crisis, and we have seen the departure of the chief executive, a senior civil servant in the Department of Health. The Government's response is to blame others. We will not look to the Minister today to play the game of dubious statistics and pretending that all is well despite what is happening in our constituencies. In my constituency, the Hornsea minor injuries unit has been saved. We are grateful for that. Its hours have been slashed, although it can take seven hours to get by public transport from the Hornsea area into Hull and back again. That is the reality for rural areas. The same hospital has lost 10 beds and there is a waiting list. One old lady—the hospital can be seen from her home—was on a waiting list while she was in Hull and unable to return and be supported by friends and family. That was because of cuts made purely on the basis of the trust's financial position.

In the same trust, in Withernsea, which is also in my constituency, the minor injuries unit that used to operate 24 hours a day has had its opening times halved. That, again, is the result of financial chaos and crisis in this Government's NHS. Perhaps it is inevitable that the statistics will be rolled out in an attempt to show that all is well, but I hope that the Minister will recognise the real issues right across Members' constituencies. As a Member representing a constituency in the north of England, I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) that the north is not unaffected.

Mr. Truswell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stuart: I am going to finish, so I apologise to the hon. Gentleman.

I hope that the Minister will be honest with us, admit the problems and suggest how they might be tackled, so that areas such as mine, and the poorest, most vulnerable people in them, cease to be let down by a Government who have spent fortunes but delivered too little.

10.20 am

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I realise that time is marching on, so I shall keep my contribution as brief as possible. I simply want to put on record some of the specific challenges facing my primary care trust in Milton Keynes, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) for setting out some of the special problems that we face.

I start by paying tribute to the primary care trusts' hard-working staff. All too often, the focus is on doctors and nurses, and little credit seems to be given to the support staff, so I would like to sort that out today.

Like virtually every trust in the country, Milton Keynes primary care trust faces a difficult financial year in 2006-07. I can, however, praise the Government—this is one thing I can praise them for—because, for first time in many years, due recognition will be given to the fact that the population of my city has increased rapidly. That has helped to relieve some of the pressure, because the old funding formula was based on out-of-date population figures, which made life difficult for trusts such as Milton Keynes.

Although I am always happy to give the Government credit where credit is due, I would probably struggle to go any further, and I apologise for that. One of the principal problems facing the trust is that although it has extra cash to take the population increase into account it feels that it has much less control over that cash. Given the current NHS crisis, it does not understand why the Government are retreating into centralised control, rather than allowing it to have total control over its cash.

With that issue to one side, it is clear that this will be yet another difficult year for the health service in Milton Keynes. However, one of the things that impresses me most about Milton Keynes PCT is that it has a clear strategy, despite the financial constraints, of developing services. It is not simply retreating. At the heart of that strategy is the start of a major change, with the trust moving from being an illness service to a health service, and I am sure that all of us would support that. Two key priorities will be to start moving more services closer to where people live and to change the pattern of emergency care. The hope is that that will be achieved by experimenting with emergency care practitioners visiting people at home, opening a walk-in centre and reducing the need for emergency care.

That, however, is where I begin to have a problem. Although those are innovative ideas, which should be applauded, the primary care trust admits that part of its motivation comes from the fact that emergency care costs are spiralling and that reducing emergency admissions is a key target in the trust's effort to contain costs.

Other factors also mean that the trust's scope for manoeuvre in the next financial year will be extremely restricted. First, the strategic health authority has charged the trust a one-off levy of £5.5 million to pay off debts from the current financial year across the region and meet the cost of reorganising the health service—an issue to which my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury referred. The idea is that some of that money will be returned to the trust at an unknown date in the future, but that is the key point—the date is unknown. My question is whether the financial crisis in the NHS has reached such a point that we now have to rob Peter to pay Paul. When will that money be returned? How can people plan?

Secondly, virtually all the £2.5 million that the trust has been told that it can use to provide extra services is already committed to the running of the new walk-in centre and paying for the new electronic care records system—there is simply no room for manoeuvre. An added problem is that the tariff and rules associated with payment by results are still being revised, and the final figures have not been released. Combined with the fact that the trust simply does not know when the money that it has to pay to meet the one-off levy will be returned to it, such problems make budgeting for the future very difficult.

I have a message for the Minister. As she may be aware, Milton Keynes is an unusual city in that it has a Labour MP, a Conservative MP and a Liberal Democrat council. However, all three political parties are united in their belief that the only future for Milton Keynes primary care trust is for its boundaries to be coterminous with those of a unitary authority. We have a great history of working closely with our great council, and not a single person believes that we should move to a wider primary care trust, which would share the north of Buckinghamshire.

My final point is about the Two Shires Ambulance NHS trust, which is an excellent three-star trust based in Northamptonshire and Buckinghamshire. It has a budget of just £30 million, and although there might be financial incentives for creating a larger trust, there is great unease locally that a super-trust that stretched all the way down to the Isle of Wight would be too large and that much local knowledge would be lost. There is great cynicism locally when the Government say that they are consulting on the reorganisation of the Two Shires trust. Will the Minister explain why, if the consultation period is still open, the jobs of chief executive and chairman in the proposed new super-trust were advertised in The Times on 19 January? Is that really what consultation is all about, with decisions being made long before consultation periods are closed?

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) for arranging this debate. I also thank you, Mr. Amess, for calling me to speak, and I know that I have to end at half-past 10. I had not intended to speak, but when I saw how few Members were intending to participate, I thought that I could perhaps get in.

I particularly congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) on identifying all the key points that are causing a major crisis in the finances of the health service. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) mentioned purchaser protection adjustment, and there is also the top-slicing of primary care trusts and the fact that we do not yet know what the tariffs will be. It is important to understand what impact that can have on hospitals.

There are certain ways in which trusts can press a button and get money from their PCTs. Some PCTs are finding that unusual things are being diagnosed and that that benefits the trusts. We cannot complain when trusts do that—they are simply using the processes that exist—but it puts other PCTs under financial pressure.

The top-slicing varies. The initial figures were between 2 and 6 per cent. and will perhaps end up at 1.5 or 2 per cent. The purchaser protection adjustment may be 2 per cent. For my trust, it is 2 per cent. this year, 3 per cent. the year after and 4 per cent.—compared with the current financial year, of course—in the subsequent year.

The big problem is that things are done at the last minute. Anyone who does financial planning in the public sector needs time to plan. In that respect, Ministers have responsibility for the shambles that they are creating in the health service because they are signing off last-minute changes to the finances. A large part of those finances are difficult to change, so those parts that can be changed suffer greater changes, and emergency care is one of them. Obviously, certain people put a greater demand on emergency resources, so a lot of effort will go into them.

It has recently been argued that managers should be sacked without compensation if they fail to manage finances—that is, they will not get a peerage. However, we really have to ask whether Ministers should be sacked without compensation for putting us in the current situation, because this is the calm before the storm. It is no good the Government saying, "It's all about local decisions," because it is not. The Government claim credit for putting lots of money into health services and say, "Isn't it brilliant?" They then cut the amount available and say, "It's nothing to do with us, guv—it's all to do with local decisions. You've closed the hospital. You've got to balance the books." However, the fact is that last-minute changes are causing the crisis.

Payment by results is turning into a massive shambles across the country. There are last-minute changes, there is no co-ordination and people have no time to plan. Frankly, we have to look very carefully at top-slicing and payment by activity, which is about £320 million across the country. If we reverse that, there is a better chance of doing something over the next year. Otherwise, everything will be a total mess.

10.29 am

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): May I begin by joining others in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing the debate? He is known across the House as a doughty fighter for Cornwall, and he has demonstrated that again this morning.

Let me pick up from where my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (John Hemming) left off. In a typically terse and effective contribution, he highlighted the kernel of the problem, namely that nobody objects to financial discipline and rigour when huge amounts of taxpayers' money are being spent, but that those on the front line and the people who manage our hospital finances are faced with permanent revolution. As many colleagues know, there is an attempt in local government to give longer-term stability through two or three-year budgets. The way things are going, the NHS would like three-week budgets.

To expand on the example given by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley, a letter went out to PCT finance directors on 1 February to say that the purchaser parity adjustment—the adjustment made in cases in which the amount paid is different from the tariff—will be halved next year. So at six or seven weeks' notice, trusts suddenly have millions of pounds more or less than they expected. To pick two cases at random, at about six weeks' notice, South Gloucestershire PCT will lose £3.8 million and Oxford City PCT will lose nearly £10 million. How is the front line, which is accused of being causing the deficits by mismanagement, expected to manage against a backdrop of permanent change? We are told that the system is designed to reward well managed trusts—those that get their deficits under control—yet those that have done so now find that their budgets are to be top-sliced to try to bail out other parts of the system.

In the midst of all that, the kernel of a good idea is trying to get out. That is to say that, given that the NHS has been shockingly unaware of its costs under Governments of both of the two larger parties for a protracted period, the move to sort out the situation, identify what the costs are and reflect them more accurately is a move in the right direction. However, we should not try to sort out in 10 weeks structural imbalances that have been built up over 10 years or more. What have the Government done? Instead of recognising that there are imbalances and developing a long-term strategy to sort them out, they are hastening the process of reform by bringing in and standardising the tariff prices more quickly. That is a strange reaction to the imbalances.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), in an unusual display of loyalty, said, essentially, "What is £800 million among friends? It is not a big percentage." However, it is a mistake to net off the surpluses against the deficits, because the fact that there is a surplus somewhere in the country does not make life any better for the place that has the deficit. The gross deficit is therefore bigger than the figure that he cited. We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives about the front-line impact of the imbalances.

It is possible to get hysterical about all this, and I accept that it is important to keep the issue in context. However, we have to accept that there is a serious problem if front-line services have to be cut, and local people cannot plan because they do not know from one week to the next what their budget is going to be next year.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who is no longer in his place, mentioned over-trading. The situation is surreal: the NHS is being driven to be more efficient, do more operations and get waiting lists down, but when it does so, it is told that it is working too hard, doing too much and causing problems and needs to slow down. We have all heard of examples. Through the Liberal Democrat website, libdemnhswatch.com, we have heard of instances that occurred earlier in the year of sessions being cancelled and people being told that they could not run their clinics. Waiting time maximums are turning into waiting time minimums. In other words, people who could be seen quicker because there is capacity in the system are being turned away and NHS facilities are lying idle because the money has gone and more cannot be spent until 1 April. That is mismanagement on a grand scale. However, it is not happening at a local level predominantly; it is happening at central level.

David Taylor: Predominantly?

Steve Webb: Yes, predominantly. Nobody is suggesting that everything is perfect at local level, but I think that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will agree that the serious mismanagement comes from the top. The trusts are acting within a framework that is determined at the top. We welcome decent pay for nurses—we have all campaigned for that—but the environment within which trusts operate is centrally determined contracts for staff, centrally determined contracts for consultants, and central arrangements for practically everything that trusts do. However, when there is a shortfall in paying for overpriced PFI contracts—perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be more sympathetic to this point—and the sums do not add up because central Government have set the tariff, it is said that the fault is local.

Mr. Lansley: Does the hon. Gentleman take the view that the flexibilities that should be offered to trusts should include an ability to price at the margin for their additional capacity? If they have available capacity, they should be able to offer it to PCTs at a marginal price in order to use it more effectively.

Steve Webb: I certainly think that that is worth considering. Anything that enables existing capacity to be used, instead of sitting idle, must be worth considering, so I am sympathetic to the idea.

David Taylor: Is the hon. Gentleman announcing a Liberal Democrat regional pay policy for NHS workers? In relation to PFI, did he pick up in today's paper the fact that the midwife of many an expensive PFI project, Laings, saw its profits jump by 43 per cent. this year? Did not his heart sink, as mine did, when that figure emerged into the public arena?

Steve Webb: I knew that I could get the hon. Gentleman off the path of loyalty if I tried. Yes, my heart would, indeed, have sunk had I read that article. That is another example of national Government policy, driven from the top, causing local NHS bodies to spend money less effectively than they might. Of course one can always spend more money, but that is not always the answer. The answer is to spend the huge amount of money that has been provided more effectively. In many of the examples of which we have heard, that is not being done.

That is a classic Government response. Take the example of winter pressures. When there is a problem in winter, money is suddenly found. If that money had been in the budget at the start of the year, it could have been carefully planned and carefully spent. What tends to happen is that central Government panic and throw money at a problem. That is a much more expensive way of doing things. One has to hire people at short notice and drag in extra capacity. Yes, waiting lists have come down, but at great cost. The Government have bought in extra capacity at a high price, when the NHS has capacity at a lower price. However, because of dogma, the Government are determined to spend the money and they have not got the bang for their buck. That is the problem.

People keep asking, "How can they have spent all that money but ended up in this situation?" Part of the answer is that a lot of the spending has been unsustainable. Money has been spent on one-off gimmicks and long-term expensive financial contracts. We need long-term financial stability, so that local trusts have freedom, local accountability and the ability to plan. Any rational business would run on that basis. Central Government must take a share of the responsibility.

The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), who makes thoughtful contributions to debates such as this and has campaigned effectively on community hospitals, raised the interesting question of how we can have spent all that money but see health inequalities growing. The problem is that deficits tend to be in places where life expectancy is, on average, better—central London is a different issue. Unfortunately, it would not necessarily help health inequalities if one were to equalise the financing and if money were to go to the deficit areas and away from the surplus areas; we are trying to tackle a double problem.

[Steve Webb]

I have one further point. We have heard about the deficits that roll over to the following year. That is not well understood—meaning that I did not understand it until relatively recently when I went to see a PCT and was told that the problem was like a double ball and chain. The PCT was going to be £20 million in deficit at the end of the financial year, and that money was going to be knocked off its income for the following year. Therefore, if it has a structural deficit of £20 million and if it does exactly the same next year as it did this year, it will be £20 million down next year. However, because its income has been cut by £20 million to pay back last year's debt, it will be as though it is £40 million down. How is it expected to recover from that? There needs to be a more measured transition to sorting out the underlying structural deficits and imbalances. However, the Government engage in constant revolution and helter-skelter reform. They do not give a chance to phased, managed transition, which has to be the best way of using taxpayers' money.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives has done the House a great service in bringing the topic before us. I hope that the Minister will tell us that she is going to put in place structures that will allow local managers to manage and to plan, and not to be subject to constant meddling.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I agree with the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) that the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) has found a timely opportunity to debate these important issues. It is timely not least in relation to his own health economy, where the pain of these issues is being felt considerably.

I note from the South West Peninsula strategic health authority's report at the end of January that it was looking not only at a sharp deterioration between months nine and 10, but at significant additional risks: £31 million of high risks were identified, illustrating the nature of the range of challenges that the authority has to deal with. All of those challenges are increasing the financial turbulence, whether it is the likelihood of emergency referrals being faster than was planned, which has been mentioned by a number of Members, or the implementation of "Agenda for Change".

One thing that has not been mentioned, except by the hon. Member for Northavon, is the range of costs imposed on the NHS by central Government. It does not mean that the improved remuneration for NHS staff is wrong. What is wrong is to have gone down the path of contracts, whether with GP consultants or "Agenda for Change", and for central Government to have underestimated the cost impacts of those changes, which they are imposing on trusts, and brought them all to bear at the same time, even though increases for the NHS are rising fast.

I shall respond to several points that were raised in the debate. Time does not permit a full discussion of NHS finances, but we will have an opportunity to discuss that again on Monday, on the Floor of the House, courtesy of the Liaison Committee.

The hon. Member for St. Ives raised an important point about resource allocation. No doubt the Minister will want to repeat something that she said on "Newsnight" the other night—that Liverpool has been subsidising the rest of the country for years. That is an interesting approach to finances. She may well say that Central Liverpool primary care trust has a weighted capitation of £1,100, but South Cambridgeshire PCT, which I have the honour of representing, has one of £1,300; ergo, her conclusion is that Central Liverpool is underfunded relative to South Cambridgeshire and is subsidising it. On that argument, Scotland is subsidising the rest of the UK dramatically in relation to NHS resources. West of Cornwall PCT has a weighted capitation of only £1,139, but that is in excess of Central Liverpool, so no doubt Liverpool is subsidising West of Cornwall.

Let us consider how much real money—cash—is going into those PCTs: in terms of the weighted capitation, it is £1,161 to West of Cornwall, £960 to South Cambridgeshire and £1,491 to Central Liverpool. I do not dispute that Central Liverpool should have more money than South Cambridgeshire, but I do dispute that a £530 difference—more than a 60 per cent. increase in resources in Central Liverpool—is necessarily justified by the levels of morbidity. That is happening across the country, and it is partly geographical.

The Secretary of State admitted to the Health Committee that the healthiest and wealthiest parts of the country were suffering those impacts. Where do we end up? We end up standing in a hospital, as I did recently at the Luton and Dunstable hospital, where I talked to the stroke board about patient discharge arrangements. The hospital deals with two PCTs: Luton PCT, which is relatively deprived—for every patient that the hospital sends out to that PCT discharge arrangements are in place—and Bedfordshire Heartlands PCT, which is relatively well off. However, many of the patients discharged to that PCT have no rehabilitation facilities available to them.

We need to do a number of things on PCT allocation. The hon. Member for St. Ives is right to say that we need to consider carefully the market forces factor. Somewhere written on my heart is "area cost adjustment". Those who know about local government finance will know that we had a long and tortuous debate about these things. One clear lesson of that debate was that where there is centrally determined pay in the public sector, it is not right simply to adjust resource allocation in line with local labour market conditions, and there is an interaction between central pay arrangements and local pay which hits somewhere between the two. That relationship must be observed; the real costs of employing staff in that area must be understood, bearing in mind the local labour market and national pay arrangements; and a proper adjustment must be found.

The Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation is reviewing PCT resource allocation this year, and it is right that it should do so. As we have stressed to the Government before, they should be looking increasingly to move from demographic assumptions based on Office for National Statistics data to GP practice lists. If the quality and outcomes framework tells us anything, it is that, increasingly, we know how many people in a community have asthma or diabetes or live with chronic conditions. Those considerations are a major component of overall costs.

Steve Webb: This is the first time that I have heard the hon. Gentleman say that, but is there not an issue about GP lists being incomplete in urban areas? Is it not the case that the middle classes always register, but the urban poor do not? Might not funding be skewed away from those who are most in need?

Mr. Lansley: Of course. I do not pretend that that is the only measure, but it is clear that some aspects of morbidity in communities are not being captured by the demographic figures presented by the ONS. In so far as there are mismatches between GP practice lists and what ONS data tell us about the number of people and the nature of the population, that must, of course, be adjusted for. As we have discovered with local government and health financing, getting allocations right is never a simple matter, but it is perfectly clear that it is wrong at the moment and needs to be changed.

The hon. Member for Northavon seems to be saying that the only way to deal with the current situation is to stop reform and hold everything up. In truth, there are two considerations. The first is that the Government have put a great deal of additional money into the NHS in the absence of reform, and are now in a hurry because they did not sort many of those things out earlier. The NHS plan in 2000 should have been just that, an NHS plan that began in 2000, but many of the changes, such as PBR, or payment by results, and the tariff, are being introduced in 2006 and 2007—that is how far behind the plan is.

The second consideration is, frankly, incompetence. At the end of the last financial year, the Government did not know what the deficit was. Three months after the end of the financial year, the Secretary of State was telling the House that it was a net £140 million; it turned out to be £250 million. As the hon. Member for Northavon said, that £250 million disguised the fact that there were gross deficits of over £600 million. In the debate that we had on the Floor of the House in November, we told the Government that it looked as though net deficits would be in the order of £700 million and that gross deficits would be £1 billion. The Secretary of State said, "Oh, it will be fine. We are actually planning. All the recovery plans are in place and the net deficit this year will be lower than it was last year." However, we know from what the late, lamented Sir Nigel Crisp told the Health Committee a week or so later that a £200 million net deficit was being targeted for this year.

John Hemming: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that frequently in NHS organisations, but not always, recovery plans involve getting additional funds from other NHS organisations, which, obviously, on a net basis, does not really help much?

Mr. Lansley: Sometimes, that is how the recovery plans are put together. In some instances, that is an acceptable way of dealing with things in a local health economy. What is unacceptable—I was going to come to this—is to go to the point at which the whole direction of reform in the NHS is being perverted. Taking one third of the addition to PCT allocations next year, which is what a 3 per cent. top-slicing on PCT allocations is, effectively says to PCTs across the country, "You can't plan on the basis of the cash increases you were anticipating for next year. All the growth money that might have been available for you next year is going to be taken away from you." In effect, all the decisions about system improvement and growth in the NHS next year will be determined by strategic health authorities, and probably taken away in order to use deficits, so there will be no growth next year as a consequence.

The incompetence has, I am afraid, extended to the tariff. On 22 February, the Department of Health told PCTs and trusts across the country that there is a severe and deteriorating position, while also telling them that the underlying errors in the tariff mean that they have no basis on which to calculate their business plans for the forthcoming year. It is a sorry tale of incompetence on the part of the Government, for which Ministers are accountable. Lord Warner at least had the grace to say, in another place, last Thursday, that he was responsible, and to apologise unreservedly. I hope that the Minister will do the same today.

10.49 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): This has been an interesting debate. I hope that you will allow, Mr. Amess, that it has been combative, and I intend to respond in true style and take no prisoners.

I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on this timely debate. It is a matter of great public debate. I particularly commend the contribution of the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), whose style I will emulate in my response.

In my firmly held view, having known the party for such a long time, hypocrisy on the subject abounds among the Liberal Democrats. With no credible policy on the future of the health service, they hide behind "The Orange Book" in which the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) discusses the central proposals of the break-up of the NHS and a move to a system of social insurance. There was not one word about any of that in today's important debate. It is interesting that all those who espoused and were involved in drawing up "The Orange Book" have been promoted.

The hon. Member for Yeovil went on to argue for a switch from a monopoly NHS system to a national health insurance system, with the heath service remaining in place but as only one of the options available to all citizens. He went on to say:

"Additional charges could be paid by those people willing to pay for higher quality non-clinical services, such as private rooms. Such 'enhancement' charges would be set by each health insurance provider."

If it is argued that "The Orange Book" was pre-general election, at the party's September conference the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten)—

Andrew George: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman will have to listen to me for a moment, as I sat and listened quietly. I shall come to Cornwall all too quickly, and he will hear my response.

[Jane Kennedy]

In September, the hon. Member for Winchester said:

"Some already question the idea that the NHS can provide everything free at the point of delivery. Is it time to start making a charge for some non-essential NHS procedures?"

Liberal Democrat Members should invite their constituents to consider what exactly their party is proposing.

The Labour Government inherited a national health service that was on its knees. In 1997 patients were corralled and managed through a waiting list system that was organised to fit the chronically poor level of resources that the Conservative Government provided. In Cornwall in 1997, in the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust, 1,172 patients waited longer than six months for in-patient treatment, including day care surgery. Now, no patients wait for more than six months. That is thanks to the hard work and dedication of the staff at the hospitals, including their managers. As has been acknowledged, it is also partly due to the receipt of record resources as a result of our policy on funding the NHS. Funding has increased, as everybody knows, from £34.7 billion in 1997 to £69.7 billion in 2004–05. By 2007–08, spending on the health service will have increased to more than £92 billion. The Conservative party utterly rejected that policy when we put it forward.

The South West Peninsula strategic health authority has seen year-on-year increases in real terms of more than 6 per cent. In 2005–06, the increase was 6.1 per cent. Next year will see a 6.2 per cent. increase in overall resources, and 2007–08 will see a 7 per cent. increase.

Mr. Truswell: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Jane Kennedy: I will give way in one moment. Neither of the Opposition parties—I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree—deserve any credence for their crocodile tears about so-called painful decisions. I shall come to the point about Liverpool in a moment.

Mr. Truswell: I thank my right hon. Friend. If the hon. Members for Banbury (Tony Baldry) and for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) had permitted me to intervene, I would have perhaps told them a story that was different from what they were trying to say. For example, in Leeds we have a deficit, which is a problem, but in cash and percentage terms it is certainly lower than the one that was inherited. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness, who is making a comment from a sedentary position, is the great champion of community hospitals, but when his party was in office we saw the closure of St. George's hospital in Leeds, Marguerite Hepton hospital, Roundhay maternity hospital, Woodlands orthopaedic hospital and The Grove convalescent hospital. That was the product of the economic miracle that his party tried to deceive the House into believing existed.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He makes a valid and proper point. The health service has made huge steps in providing faster, more convenient access to care. There is so much that we can say about how the health service has improved: improved services, reduced waiting times at their lowest in nearly a generation, big reductions in mortality rates, and accident and emergency departments that have been transformed from the dreadful memories that Labour Members have of the state of the health service in the run-up to 1997. In the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust, more than 96 per cent. of patients consistently wait no longer than four hours in accident and emergency.

Andrew George: I forgive the Minister for the rather bizarre way in which she opened her speech, as attack is the best form of defence. She must accept that I have acknowledged the improvements and the fact that the money is going in. We voted for those improvements. However, will the Minister please address the kernel of the questions that have been asked about the mismanagement of that money?

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will come to that.

The truth is that we have made enormous strides in the quality and quantity of services that are provided to the general public and to patients of the health service. We have thousands of extra clinicians throughout the country. We are replacing old buildings with new hospitals or surgeries, and providing new ambulance stations and ambulances, some through the PFI route. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who is not here, might quarrel with me about that but he would acknowledge the role that private finance initiatives are playing.

In 1997, the Royal Cornwall trust had 102 consultants. Now there are 184. The hon. Member for St. Ives spoke about the concerns about budgeting at the trust, but the plans that it has in place involve improving efficiency in management and administration. It will also, as it says in its press release,

"be fundamentally reviewing how we deliver patient care services, through" service redesign. In particular, it will be "concentrating on improving day surgery rates, theatre utilisation," improving

"length of stay and reducing the numbers of patients who fail to turn up for appointments."

All those steps will result in improved patient services to those patients who use the trust.

Instead of being criticised for making sensible proposals about how to manage their resources more effectively to deliver improvements in services for local people, which is what the hon. Gentleman is engaging in with his local campaign, management in the area should be commended for their actions and supported in their proposals. We are working with those organisations that face the biggest problems, and sending in the expertise to help them address their problems of poor financial management.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) asked whether health service organisations were over-trading. To some degree, I agree with his proposition. Waiting lists have virtually gone. Patients are managed in a different way and the pressures on services are changing. Top-slicing has been raised by a number of hon.

Members. Strategic health authorities are agreeing locally what arrangements should be put in place to help all the organisations in an area to organise their finances so that they continue to deliver improving services. The hon. Gentleman might say that we are dictating the way forward, but that is actually arranged locally through systems that have been used in the past. Deficits might traditionally have been managed by one part of a SHA area helping another out—that continues to be done in Liverpool, although Liverpool did not always have the extra resources that it now has. I remember the days when there were serious inequalities in areas such as the one that I have the privilege to represent and the struggle that the health service had to deliver even decent services to the local community.

The overspending in the NHS and the over-performing remain a relatively small proportion of the overall budget. All areas of the country—

NHS Reconfigurations

12.30 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): It is a delight to serve under your informal, friendly chairmanship, Mr. Bayley. I am pleased to see the Minister here, and I applied for a 30-minute debate rather than a 90-minute one because I wanted her all to myself. That is not because I want to score political points, but because I want to help tackle the appallingly difficult subject of acute hospital reconfigurations. The debate gives us a splendid opportunity to reflect on that issue.

Given NHS deficits, the European working time directive and ever-increasing demands for better and more expensive treatments, the NHS must make economies. On an entirely separate issue, I would love to have an open, wide-ranging debate about health care rationing. On this subject, however, there is pretty much agreement across the country that there will have to be further reconfigurations of acute hospital services. Given the changes in practice and the Government White Paper, many of those services are probably not affordable or necessary.

On 9 February, Nick Timmins, an excellent reporter with the Financial Times, wrote an article headed "Financial mayhem exposes structural problems that beset the NHS". In it, he says that > "the changing nature of medicine means bigger reconfigurations are needed that will see more towns lose their accident and emergency departments and some other services."

NHS managers are crying out for the politics to be taken out of such decisions. Fairly recently, in the Health Service Journal, the Prime Minister was reported as saying that the Government would back managers over difficult decisions.

It might appear odd that someone who stood on the platform of saving a hospital should be speaking in that way, but I am uniquely qualified to tell the Minister, and thus the Secretary of State, exactly how not to carry out a reconfiguration exercise and how the Government have already put in place several mechanisms to take the politics out of the issue. If the Government used those mechanisms, they would have a good chance of success.

As I am sure that the Minister is aware, the Kidderminster effect has been spoken of with bated breath in certain quarters since my election and it actually achieved the honour of a cartoon in this week's Health Service Journal. People now refer not to the Kidderminster effect, but to being Kidderminstered. The cartoon compared that to being Scunthorped, although I really cannot imagine what is happening in Scunthorpe. None the less, we have achieved cartoon status.

I should make it clear that I am talking purely and simply about acute general hospitals, not community hospitals, which are entirely different. Community hospitals can be seen as absolutely in line with the White Paper and necessary for keeping work away from acute hospitals. With few exceptions, they deserve to be retained and used more and more.

What, then, happened in Kidderminster and why was it a disaster? A drastic downgrading took away the accident and emergency department and all acute in-patient services. People could no longer go to the hospital with a heart attack, acute appendicitis or a broken leg. Everything that makes an acute hospital an acute hospital was taken away. It was a total robbery, which was carried out simply to benefit two other hospitals and two other communities. How was that possible?

The health authority at the time used the marvellous divide-and-rule tactic and gave the other communities benefits so that they would support the change. It gave the project the euphemistic title "Investing in Excellence", and other reconfigurations have titles such as "Making Things Better". Everybody can see through those titles and they know that the reconfigurations are probably not making things better for them.

I wrote a saga on spin, although I shall not give hon. Members the whole thing. Here, however, are two examples. In Kidderminster, the health authority at the time said:

"Under the preferred proposal, a comprehensive hospital will remain (in Kidderminster), dealing with the majority of both elective and emergency services, for the people in its catchment area."

How could the hospital deal with the majority of elective and emergency services when it does not have an A and E or any acute beds? Then, there is a classic misuse of statistics:

"Out of 3.5 million contacts between Worcestershire patients and the NHS each year, less than 1 per cent. (around 12,000) would have to travel further in future for in-patient treatment."

Every one of the patients from the Kidderminster area had to travel further for in-patient treatment. We must avoid euphemistic titles and spin because people are sensible and can see through them—they are not fools.

Responses to consultation must also be used sensibly. In the case of Kidderminster hospital, the responses from three community health councils, two county councils, four district councils and 11 parish and town councils were completely disregarded, as were innumerable responses from churches, medical groups and patient groups. To make matters worse, the outcome was decided on the basis of a weird pseudo-statistical option appraisal in which people had to give weightings and scores to the options. Twenty weighting sheets were sent out, but only 16 were returned, although that, at least, is understandable. However, 24 score sheets were also returned, even though there were only 21 scorers. One can therefore see why there was absolute resistance at the time to this total robbery, which was carried out with no fairness and as a result of a classic non-consultation.

What have the Government done since my election? Several things. First, health overview and scrutiny committees were established at county council level with the right to refer contested decisions to the Secretary of State for Health. With the demise of community health councils, primary care trust patient forums were given the right to refer issues to overview and scrutiny committees. In April 2002, a report in the Health Service Journal, headed "Powers of observation", stated that "it is interesting to speculate whether some major NHS changes would have been handled differently if the new arrangements for local authority scrutiny had been in place. Would the reconfiguration of acute services in Worcestershire, or the strategic changes in Manchester, have gone ahead in the same way? Almost certainly, the NHS organisations involved would have been forced to tackle the process of consultation differently—and the resulting changes might well have been different, too."

Overview and scrutiny committees are therefore incredibly valuable.

Next, there is the independent reconfiguration panel, which was established in 2003 to advise the Secretary of State independently and with no political input about the merits of contested reconfiguration decisions. The panel contains clinicians, managers and members of the public and draws in other groups to review particular reconfiguration decisions. The advice will be made public; there for all to see and understand, so that there is no chance of political influence, spin or obfuscation. The organisation has tremendous potential.

What has happened to the panel? We asked another Minister at a Health Committee meeting a few weeks ago. The answer was that eight cases had been referred by overview and scrutiny committees to the Secretary of State, and at that time only one of them had been passed on to the panel. One had been withdrawn, one awaited decision and five had been decided by the Secretary of State without reference to the advice of the panel. The situation was brought into sharp relief in a recent debate in the main Chamber, when a Labour Back Bench Member was very pleased that the Secretary of State had decided to site a new hospital in her constituency and an Opposition Member was livid that it had not been placed in his. The process had obviously led to political bias and a huge opportunity had been lost. The decision should have been made not by the Secretary of State but by the independent, non-political panel, which is sitting there waiting for referrals.

I spoke to the independent reconfiguration panel's chief executive today, just to ensure that I was up to date. The panel has received two more referrals, so the total is now 10. To my amazement and pleasure, the one that was waiting to be decided or referred has been referred by the Secretary of State to the IRP with the extremely sensible suggestion that the panel get round the table with the overview and scrutiny committee and the health trusts involved and thrash out the way forward. I hope that that means that the Secretary of State has received the message that the IRP is there and that if it makes its decisions openly and independently, without political bias, MPs might argue, but they will not have a case to make because the decision will not ultimately be made by a political party in the interests of that political party.

The annex to the letter that I received following the Health Committee meeting contained at least one inaccuracy—I shall come back to inaccuracies later. It said of one referral that the Secretary of State had decided to support the local NHS decision. In fact, exactly the opposite was true; she had decided to go against the local NHS recommendation in favour of the Labour-held constituency.

I have mentioned overview and scrutiny committees and the independent reconfiguration panel. In February 2003, the document "Keeping the NHS local: a new direction of travel" came out, and it was followed by a further paper in July 2004. Since the downgrading of Kidderminster, no hospital or community has been treated as unfairly, severely or badly, but several have been downgraded successfully. Consider Hexham, which has a tiny hospital, serving only 70,000 patients. That has been changed, but it has retained cover for medical emergencies, a lot of surgery and an urgent care centre. The hospital at Bishop Auckland is also smaller than Kidderminster was. It has lost emergency surgery but has retained medical admissions, elective surgery and an urgent care centre. Those changes have met with acceptance.

A great deal of work has gone on in various organisations to work out how to maintain local access for straightforward emergencies. That is the critical thing that communities want. I draw the Minister's attention to the acute hospitals review in Northern Ireland, which took place as long ago as June 2001. For the first time, that split accident and emergency departments into three groups: the major, all-singing, all-dancing ones where patients could go with head and chest injuries, an intermediate group and a level three, which it envisaged would be "a centre serving a smaller catchment population, operating in a managed clinical network with a level two service. The range of services available in each centre will vary according to local circumstances. They would have physicians, surgeons and anaesthetists available during the day and a full A&E service."

That sort of compromise would be much more acceptable than losing an A and E and ending up with a minor injuries unit without a doctor on site.

I shall conclude by listing the lessons that I should like the Minister to take on board. First, proper consultation means honesty, no euphemisms, no spin, no pseudo-statistics and, finally, a vote by local people. Obviously, one must comply with section 11 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001, and the mandatory referral to overview and scrutiny committees. As an aside, I am rather worried about the PCT merger consultations that are not going through section 11. They could be challenged.

Secondly, there must be total accuracy. A rather distressing example of inaccuracy came to my attention last week. The Health Committee is undertaking an inquiry into independent sector treatment centres. A large submission was received from the Department of Health about the existing ones, so I looked up my own centre. The information is not right. It says that we have a local emergency centre. We have not; we have a minor injuries unit. It says that we have back-up in the form of telemedicine links between us and A and E departments. Those links were taken out some years ago, because nobody used them because there was nobody to answer them. It says that we have a midwifery-led maternity unit. That was closed in 2003. The bed numbers do not tally with my understanding. All those inaccuracies throw a dubious light on the entire submission. I do not know the details of other treatment centres so I cannot check whether they are correct, but it is crucial for a Minister to have the right information. If the Department were right in saying that we in Kidderminster have a local emergency centre, what would we be making the fuss about? It is because we have not that we have made a fuss. The third lesson, which I shall not labour now, is that we should use the independent reconfiguration panel that was set up to do just what it says.

The Kidderminster consultation failed and became political because it was a robbery and unfair. People saw through the spin and all the pain was borne by one community. Changes have to come in many parts of the country, including Yorkshire, the north-east, Shropshire and Gloucestershire. To succeed, they have to be seen to be fair, based on networking and sharing. The disadvantages have to be shared as well. We cannot send everybody from one area to another; people have to go both ways. Services must be built up in one place if they are removed from the other so that it can be seen that the disadvantages are being borne by both places. We all want all-singing, all-dancing acute hospitals, but we cannot have them; that is not possible. Therefore, there must be sharing and when decisions are contested, the IRP must be used.

I shall leave the Minister with three proverbs, because fairness is a part of our way of life: from the 14th century, "Fair and softly goes far in a day"; one we all know from the 16th century, "A fair exchange is no robbery"; and from the 19th century, "Fair play is a jewel." The independent reconfiguration panel could be a referee and take things out of the political equation to see fair play for all concerned.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to be here this afternoon with you in the Chair, Mr. Bayley.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) on securing the debate on NHS reconfiguration, and thank him for his contribution to the recent Select Committee on Health report on changes to primary care trusts. The report has provided a helpful contribution to the debate. We carefully considered the Committee's recommendations, and published our response last week. He argued cogently, and I do not disagree with a lot of what he said; in fact, I strongly agree with much of it. There are some suggestions to take on board.

It is fair to say that all the changes being made in the national health service are designed to achieve even better NHS services for patients. That is the goal, and the test, of everything that we do, including our asking the health service to engage in increasing financial transparency, which is causing the current high level of public debate about the future of health services. PCTs need to become the focal point for planning, designing and shaping local health services, but in a way that best meets the needs of local communities and delivers value for money from allocated resources.

The hon. Gentleman rightly says that there is agreement across England that there will have to be reconfiguration of acute hospital services. Waiting lists are at their lowest level for generations. Under previous Governments, patients were corralled into waiting lists. Patients were managed to suit the chronic shortage of available resources, or, in some circumstances, the way in which the health service was configured in any locality. The Government have addressed that problem by providing extra resources and better pay to health service staff, which has encouraged more flexibility in the way in which services are delivered. The consequence of that is that the backlog of people waiting for urgent, acute in-patient treatment is clearing.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we must ask our acute hospitals what their future role should be. We are providing more support for people with long-term conditions and are managing their conditions differently. Even cancer is becoming considered more as a long-term condition and less as the absolutely appalling critical and acute illness that it used to be seen as. Therefore, it is managed differently. The improvement of screening services and the better monitoring of people's general health mean that we can intervene at an earlier stage to prevent people from getting to the stage of having the acute health needs that require the acute response that we have traditionally built into the NHS.

The management of a range of acute conditions has changed. The provision of cardiology services is an example of that. A strong debate is going on in the west of Cheshire, where Halton hospital is facing its services being moved to Warrington hospital. The strong local debate there has been couched very much in the terms described by the hon. Gentleman when he talked about the strong attachment that local communities have to their local hospitals, their fears about services being changed and their need to be reassured that changes are being made for the sake of providing better services that are clinically safer and that will provide better outcomes for patients.

Cardiology is one area in which treatment is being transformed by advancements and innovations. It is being delivered by the better management of people with heart conditions, so that open-heart surgery is performed much less often than it was. Management of patients is organised differently. Indeed, the kind of patient is changing, so the pressures faced by acute services is also changing.

The hon. Gentleman invites us to take politics out of service configuration. Would that it were possible. He rightly advocates the structures that we have put in place to do that. He uses the example of Wyre Forest and his constituents' experiences, and describes the consultation as being not the best-handled consultation ever.

The hon. Gentleman may not know that I cut my parliamentary political teeth in Liverpool, Broadgreen, where the then Government, or the then local NHS, sought to close the accident and emergency unit in the local district general hospital that served the constituency that I sought to represent. The then Liberal Democrat candidate—she is now a Labour Member, my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Rosie Cooper)—and I fought a vigorous local campaign against each other to see who could save the hospital the quickest. The problem in that case was that, although there were anxieties about the A and E, I believed that a coherent argument was being presented that the A and E services there were clinically less sound than the services that would be provided in the proposed bigger A and E department, which would be only three or four miles away, and which would have 24-hour consultant provision. That campaign was in the context of wholesale hospital closures across Merseyside, and local communities genuinely feared that they would lose the whole hospital, not just the A and E.

I know only too well how deeply attached people are to their hospitals. If people were to visit my constituency today and see the hospital that has been retained on the site, they would see a unit that provides some of the best cardiology services in the north-west of England through the cardiothoracic centre. Other services on that site are continually being developed and invested in, and local people can have confidence that those developments are genuinely being made in the interests of better local services.

The hon. Gentleman strongly recommends that we support the oversight and scrutiny process, which we do. As he rightly says, the consultations must be genuine and open, and command ongoing public support. He expressed his concern that the consultation on the primary care trust and strategic health authority configuration is not a section 11 consultation. He is right to say that, because reconfiguration proposals amount to managerial and administrative change only, there is no duty to consult under section 11. However, it is a full public consultation involving a wide variety of local stakeholders, including patient and public representative bodies. I know that in his area, the west midlands, the SHA has gone beyond the regulations to consult with a wider variety of people, including local MPs, professional executive committee chairs, the police and fire services and the general public.

We have made it clear in guidance and correspondence to all SHAs that the consultation must be conducted fairly and properly. I came to the debate prepared for discussion about the "Commissioning a patient-led NHS" consultation. I have given an open and honest response, taking on board the hon. Gentleman's helpful contribution. I know that I can look to him for support and encouragement as I take forward some of these difficult configuration issues and as we develop the health service further, always to the benefit of our patients.

Wild Birds (Dark Peak)

12.59 pm

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this debate with your good self in the Chair, Mr. Bayley, and on such an important issue. I am pleased also have my hon. Friend the Minister here to give his response. I acknowledge his commitment to his brief. I worked with him on the Standing Committee that considered the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill and know that he believes in the importance of protecting areas of special interest and the biodiversity of our natural environment. I look forward to his response, which will, I am sure, be up to his usual high standard.

I shall start by briefly describing the area to illustrate its diversity. That is important to make it understood why I can argue that birds of prey are in decline in this area of the Peak district. I want to discuss the north-eastern corner of my constituency, which is also the north-eastern aspect of the Dark Peak. Its northern boundary is defined by the Woodhead pass, while its southern boundary is represented by the equally famous Snake pass. It is sometimes difficult to access cross-Pennine routes, as we have seen today with the closure of the Snake pass, but both roads are key for traffic between Manchester and Sheffield. The eastern boundary of the area connects the two passes via the A6102, a road that runs parallel to the river Don and is the main route through the upper Don valley.

Stocksbridge and Deepcar were the principal settlements in the area, right on the eastern edge, and are towns to this day. Their residents live in homes that cling to the side of the Don valley as it climbs to the Peak district boundary on the other side of Bolsterstone village.

The area possesses many reservoirs. Everybody has heard of Ladybower, but lesser known are the truly beautiful reservoirs of the north-east moors, which is not to denigrate in the least the lovely Ladybower. Agden, Dale Dyke and Strines reservoirs, for example, are well-known to Sheffield people. The latter was until recently known to local birdwatchers as a prime area for goshawk displays. Broomhead, Langsett and Midhope are small reservoirs with populations of crossbills, curlews and skylarks.

The other communities in the area stand in great contrast to the steel towns, as they are small and close-knit; Upper Midhope, Midhopestones and Bolsterstone are all small hamlets. The area is characterised by isolated farms and cottages, such as the cottage at Wigtwizzle, an area teaming with songbirds, and Hungerhill farm, which is impressive in early spring because of the large number of swallows returning to the area. The area has its crags, too. Wharncliffe crags, for example, are locally recognised for their nightjars as well as their iron age quernstones. Rocher Edge, near Bradfield, has been known as a nesting site for raptors.

The area's woodlands are typified perhaps most impressively by the wonderful Broomhead wood, known locally as the "Secret Wood" although everybody knows where it is. A broad-leaved bluebell wood with a healthy population of songbirds, it contrasts superbly with the numerous conifer plantations that climb up the slopes of the valleys from the reservoirs.

Finally, alongside the woodlands and lovely isolated hamlets run vast and forbidding expanses of moorland. Broomhead moor, Midhope moor and Bradfield moor have all recently been closed to members of the general public. They are places adjacent to civilisation, but walking over them one feels as though civilisation has been left well behind. The only companions in those places are the red grouse and the golden plover. I love that area. When I am in London, amid the noise and the heat of the city and dealing with the pressures of parliamentary life, I keep calm by imagining that I am walking through Broomhead valley, heading for the trig point, or that I am crossing the north-east moors from Langsett to Howden in Derwentdale. I occasionally go into the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt).

It is a wonderful walk, particularly in spring, when the meadow pipits return to upland areas. However, I have never in recent years seen the birds of prey that might be expected in such a diverse and heavily protected landscape. My personal experience mirrors the trends analysed in the report of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, "Peak Malpractice". The report, published last week, details the alarming declines in the populations of some protected bird species on the Dark Peak. The evidence that it presents suggests that those declines cannot be explained by any natural phenomenon and that illegal persecution of such birds is to blame.

I want to describe in more detail what is happening on the Dark Peak, and to describe what needs to be done to stop the Dark Peak from becoming a no-go zone for some of Britain's most cherished wildlife.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): The hon. Lady will be aware of a report by the "Moors for the Future" project, which covered the entire Peak district. It was carried out in conjunction with many organisations, including English Nature, the National Trust and so on. They found that the overall population of birds of prey over the peak district were at record high levels. For instance, populations of peregrine falcons and others had increased by more than 200 per cent. How does she think that the Dark Peak, where she claims there has been a fall in population, is different from the rest of the Peak district? The area and shooting interests are precisely the same in both cases.

Ms Smith: That is precisely my point. The populations are increasing both nationally and across the Peak District national park, but not in the north-east moors and in Derwentdale. The key problem is that if the RSPB is wrong in assuming that illegal killing of birds is the reason for that, someone must come up with another reason.

The moors of the Dark Peak, particularly the moors of its north-eastern corner, are largely managed for driven grouse shooting, a practice that has over a long period helped to shape the landscape. That management has helped the moors to become an important area for many ground-nesting birds. However, some species are absent or rarer than they should be.

[Ms Smith]

A particular concern is the decline in the breeding population of birds of prey in the past decade, which has occurred at a time when there has been no significant change in the nesting habitat. Indeed, increases in the number of curlews, lapwings, snipe and red grouse suggest that the heather, blanket bog and grassland that characterises the moors are sustaining healthy populations of those special birds. The prey necessary to sustain populations of raptors is obviously there in abundance.

The decline has also occurred in the context of a slow recovery of raptor populations across the country, which was the point made by the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson). To take the goshawk as an example, over the past nine years a stable population in south Wales has produced more than twice as many young goshawks from each nest than the north-east peak.

There are documented instances of deliberate targeting of birds of prey, which are highlighted in the report and are worth referring to in this debate. In January 2004, a gamekeeper from Derwentdale, Reg Cripps, was convicted of recklessly disturbing a goshawk and destroying its eggs. He was given a suspended three-month prison sentence.

In January 2005, a pigeon lure was found in use on open moorland in the north-east peak. Lures are normally used by arable farmers to entice pigeons for shooting. There is no obvious reason why pigeons should be lured for shooting on a heather moor. Birds of prey, however, can be attracted to such lures, where they are vulnerable to shooting.

Mr. Atkinson: There was a Land Rover parked near the lure. What explanation did the owner of the Land Rover give for the lure being there?

I also want to tell the hon. Lady that gamekeepers often shoot pigeons on moors. Pigeons compete for the foodstuffs and berries that the grouse live on. It could be perfectly sensible game management to lure and shoot pigeons, which is a legal activity.

Ms Smith: The Land Rover and the people in question had gone by the time that the RSPB had been called to the site. Bilberries, which are the berries that I believe the hon. Gentleman refers to, are often garnered and gathered by the people of Bolsterstone and Midhope before any game birds get to them. Many a breakfast table in the Bolsterstone area is graced with a jar of jam very soon after the bilberries have ripened. I find it hard to believe that bilberries are in need of protection with pigeon lures.

At the end of 2002, a member of the public watched two men dressed in camouflage gear and carrying shotguns emerge from a wood known to be a goshawk roost site. They had been playing a tape of goshawk calls. There is an ongoing problem with the deliberate and illegal targeting of birds of prey. I am sure that all responsible landowners would deplore that. The problem is magnified by the fact that there are also many examples of goshawk and peregrine nests having inexplicably failed.

In the 1990s, there was a well-established nesting population of seven to 11 pairs of goshawks in the north-east Peak, but the species was lost as a breeding bird from the woodlands in that area by 2002. It is important to point out that the area is a wonderful mix of woodland and moor, and that goshawks find such areas attractive for breeding. In the 1970s and 1980s, the moors and woodlands between Sheffield and Holmfirth were well known as the place to see goshawks, but no young have been raised on the north-east moors since 2000, when just one chick was reared from four occupied territories. The suitability of nest sites and the food supply for this bird has not changed. Red grouse and songbirds are on the increase. Therefore, why has the goshawk disappeared from the north-east moors of the Dark Peak?

There has been a similar decline in peregrine falcons. There were three pairs on the north-east moors as recently as 1996, but they have not even appeared at breeding sites since 2000. There is no indication that there is less food or that fewer nest sites are available, which might prevent the peregrine from being more successful. I am familiar with one of the nesting sites, a remote crag that is not particularly popular with the hordes of weekend walkers who tend to stick to the grander landscapes of the Hope and Edale valleys. I know that nothing has changed in relation to that nesting site; it is still there, as forbidding and secretive as it ever was, a vegetated cliff edge located amid a plentiful food supply.

These declines are of great concern. They have happened despite the high degree of protection enjoyed by the north-east Peak. The moors are a special protection area, a special area of conservation and a site of special scientific interest. Although it is important to stress that the RSPB report does not lay the blame for the declines in these birds at the door of any individual, it is true that there are numerous examples of deliberate destruction of birds of prey on grouse-shooting estates throughout Scotland and England. I hope that the Minister agrees that it is up to the landowners in the Dark Peak to work with the statutory nature conservation organisations and enforcement authorities to ensure that the area does not become a no-go zone for protected wildlife.

Government action is needed too. The Government's record so far is not to be dismissed. They introduced the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, and the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill is going through Parliament. My constituents have embraced the right to roam; they now enjoy access to the moors of the north-east Peak for the first time, and they celebrate that. The NERC Bill includes some important new measures to protect vulnerable wildlife, such as further restrictions on the possession of pesticides that are harmful to wildlife and further protection of nests of certain birds which re-use those nests. However, given the ongoing concerns about the illegal use of pesticides to poison protected wildlife, the Government should make sure that the list of proscribed pesticides under the NERC Bill is as long as possible. I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments on that.

The Government should also consult as soon as possible on adding species to the list of those whose nests will be given year-round protection. "Peak Malpractice" highlights the problem of the nests of peregrines and ravens being disturbed or destroyed. They are species that re-use their nests, and they could benefit from being added to the list. In answer to a parliamentary written question of mine, the Minister denied that there was a need to list those birds for year-round nest protection, but the events taking place in the north-east Peak suggest that there is a need to take proactive action to prevent decline elsewhere, and to help in the process of re-establishing healthy populations of these raptors in the areas under discussion in our debate.

The Government's announcement two weeks ago of £250,000 of funding for a national wildlife crime unit is welcome. That unit will have a key role to play in ensuring that the police are given support and advice when they investigate wildlife crime. However, it is vital that other Departments, including the Home Office and the Treasury, recognise the key part that they have to play, both in supporting long-term funding, and in giving a steer that wildlife crime must be a key priority for the enforcement agencies.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments and hope to receive a positive response for the sake of wildlife, of the north-east Peak, and of all the individuals and communities inhabiting the area; I speak as one such individual. We cannot afford to lose permanently the raptor populations that traditionally have helped characterise the Dark Peak. I ask the Minister to recognise that the Dark Peak environment is losing one of its richest and most thrilling ingredients—the sight of a goshawk exhibiting its sky-dance display.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): I call the Minister.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab) rose—

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Is the hon. Gentleman intervening?

Tom Levitt: I sought the permission of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) to make a short contribution, and I have informed the Minister of that. I regret not having informed you, Mr. Bayley.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): If the Minister is content, I call Mr. Tom Levitt.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight) indicated assent.

1.16 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I rise to support my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith). My constituency also covers the Dark Peak and shares similar characteristics to those that my hon. Friend has described. Indeed, the north-east moors, which are the subject of her debate, are immediately adjacent to the High Peak boundary, and it is therefore possible to compare the wildlife characteristics of the two areas. On reading the report of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, I was delighted to discover that the problem that has been mentioned does not exist within the area of High Peak that is immediately adjacent to the north-east moors. The problem is confined to a relatively small area of my hon. Friend's constituency, where there is a track record of disturbance of birds of prey.

Last weekend, in preparation for this debate, I had a conversation with a Peak district farmer in my constituency whose area shares the Dark Peak characteristics and on whose farm grouse shooting regularly takes place. He was very proud that there were birds of prey on his farm and enhancing his environment, and he believed that it was perfectly possible for grouse-shooting interests and birds of prey to exist side by side. That makes it all the more odd that these things appear to be happening just outside High Peak, on land with similar characteristics.

Mr. Atkinson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tom Levitt: I am about to resume my place, and I want to give the Minister plenty of time to respond. I hope that he will respond positively to the questions of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough.

1.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) on securing this important debate and on making such a fine contribution. In the relatively brief period since she was elected to this House, she has already distinguished herself as a trenchant champion not only for her constituents and for Sheffield, but for biodiversity. She has a good understanding of the issues under discussion, as we would expect of the chair of the all-party conservation and wildlife group.

Debates such as these provide a valuable opportunity for Members to ensure that Ministers are fully briefed and aware of concerns. In preparing for this debate, I read this morning the recent Royal Society for the Protection of Birds report, "Peak Malpractice", which my hon. Friend referred to, and the response from the Countryside Alliance, which the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) was perhaps referring to. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing these matters to my attention.

The report raises a subject that is of concern to me, the Government and, I am sure, most landowners, as well as the many people who live in the Peak district and those who enjoy visiting its stunning landscape. I was lucky enough to visit the area this January, and I was impressed by the work being carried out there, in particular by the "Moors for the Future" project, but also by the project that my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) made sure I went to see.

In responding to the debate, I will comment on the report and the overall state of the bird population in the Peak district, on the measures we are taking to tackle the threats to birds, and on efforts to improve enforcement in respect of wildlife crime. As we have heard, the RSPB report highlights the decline of some species of birds of prey and discusses evidence of illegal activities, such as the persecution of birds and their nests and the trapping and poisoning of birds. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough went into some detail on the examples given in the report.

[Jim Knight]

When I read the report, I was struck by the effort being put in by a range of organisations and volunteers, who obviously care a great deal about the wild bird populations of the Dark Peak, and who are doing their utmost to ensure the long-term survival of birds of prey. For that, I thank them. Although the figures in the RSPB report suggest a worrying pattern, issues relating to birds of prey in the Dark Peak need to be placed in the context of the Peak district as a whole and the overall situation in respect of bird populations. There has not been a decline in numbers of all wild birds; populations of many species are increasing, as we have heard. Declines in peregrine numbers have been restricted geographically to the Dark Peak area. The last national census of peregrine falcons in 2002 showed an overall increase in numbers, and I can certainly report that that is the case for my constituency in Dorset, too.

I agree with my hon. Friend that declines in goshawk numbers are worrying, and have been most pronounced in the Dark Peak area, but populations of many other species of moorland bird are stable or increasing in the Peak district. The moorlands of the Peak district support populations of European importance of golden plover, merlin, peregrine falcon and short-eared owl. The numbers of all those species have increased since 1990. A number of other species of upland bird have also declined in recent years, although those declines are not restricted to the Dark Peak area of the Peak district. The species concerned include the twite, the wheatear and the dunlin. That is obviously of concern.

The illegal activity, both proven and suspected, which has adversely affected the goshawk and the peregrine could have been committed by a small number of individuals in the immediate vicinity of the north-east moors. I would not want anyone present, or anyone reading this debate subsequently, to think that many people were involved and were affecting those bird numbers. The vast majority of people want such species protected.

Mr. Atkinson: I am grateful to the Minister for making that clear; I would have made that point to the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), had he given way, because he implied that shooting interests were somehow responsible for a decline in the localised area that we are discussing. As we know, shooting interests cover the whole Peak district, where there has been a substantial increase in numbers of birds of prey. That shows that good grouse moor management is a benefit to, not an enemy of, wildlife.

Jim Knight: I certainly agree that good grouse moor management is important for protecting and enhancing our moorland habitats if we are to achieve our tough targets. On sites of special scientific interest, for example, we have to work well with managers of the moorlands. The heather-burning consultation, which we are currently assessing, is an example of how we are trying to listen to such managers while making sure that we also listen to those with a biodiversity interest.

Ms Smith: I accept entirely the point that those responsible for the illegal poisoning or killing of birds in Dark Peak are in a tiny minority. Nevertheless, at the eyrie on the west side of Derwent Dale, there was complete breeding failure from 1999 to 2004, but as soon as the National Trust put a public viewing area in place peregrine falcons starting breeding there again. Does that not suggest that something illegal is going on, regardless of the numbers involved?

Jim Knight: My hon. Friend makes a useful point. Certainly, we are not complacent about the possible activity of those few individuals and its effect on important species.

For many years now, all wild birds have been afforded strict protection under UK legislation. That protection refers to illegal activities such as killing or poisoning. Section 1 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 gives wild birds protection from being killed, injured or taken, and their nests and eggs are protected from being taken, damaged or destroyed.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, through the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill we seek to enhance protection of our native wildlife and to address some of the issues that the RSPB has rightly raised. Two clauses in that Bill introduce greater protection for birds of prey. They provide for the protection, at any time of year, of the nests of certain birds that reuse their nests, and deal with the possession of pesticides that are harmful to wildlife. The clause on protection of nests will make it an offence, at any time of year, to take, damage or destroy the nest of a wild bird species included in a new schedule. The new schedule covers golden eagles, white-tailed eagles and osprey, all of which are subject to reintroduction or re-establishment programmes. The provision is aimed at supporting their long-term breeding success by protecting their nests all year round.

A number of amendments were tabled during the Commons and Lords stages of the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill. My hon. Friend referred to her written question, in which she suggested that we extend the list of species in the schedule. We have decided to focus on the most endangered species—those whose populations would be severely threatened by the loss of just one nest—and differentiate between a single nest and nesting sites. Peregrine falcons and barn owls do not build nests, but instead use ledges; they will use man-made structures if they are available. If Natural England is of the opinion that an area is important for other rare birds of special interest, it can designate the area a site of special scientific interest, thereby bringing legislative protection to the area. My hon. Friend may want to dwell on that. Obviously, if she wants to correspond with me further, I would welcome that.

The clause on the possession of pesticides that are harmful to wildlife will enable the Secretary of State to list those ingredients of pesticides that she believes could cause harm to wild birds and/or animals. The clause will make it an offence to possess a pesticide containing a proscribed ingredient, unless it can be shown that possession was for lawful use in accordance with relevant pesticide, biocide or poisons legislation. My hon. Friend suggested that I might want to ensure that there is a long list of pesticides when we introduce the relevant regulations. She will be aware, as an assiduous member of the Standing Committee considering the Bill, that no pesticides will be banned by the Bill itself, although it will provide the Secretary of State with the power to make an order on which the proscribed pesticide ingredients are listed. A full consultation will be carried out before any ingredient is listed on the order, and as yet we have not put that list together. However, I will bear in mind my hon. Friend's comments when I see the proposals.

The Government are taking a number of positive steps in the Peak district, in partnership with a range of organisations, to enhance the wildlife of the area. Those steps include the "Moors for the Future" project, an ambitious project tackling the restoration of significant areas of upland habitat across the Peak district. There are many other projects, including the biodiversity action plan and the Peak district vision project. There is also the important work by various agencies on the Dark Peak site of special scientific interest. Major surveys were made of the Peak district's moorlands in 1990 and 2004. We note carefully the changes that we find through such surveys.

Finally, I shall just touch on the extra commitment that we have made to tackling wildlife crime through investment in the wildlife crime unit, which my hon. Friend mentioned. I announced that investment last month. I have had positive discussions with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on the importance of that unit, and assure my hon. Friend that the Home Secretary is keen to ensure that the unit prospers.

While I hope that hon. Members will agree that, the picture is not always as gloomy as is sometimes suggested, we should not rest on our laurels or be complacent about our wild birds and issues affecting them. Instead, we should build on the introduction of the new offences in the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill and the setting up of the reinforced wildlife crime unit by continuing to work proactively to protect our precious biodiversity, which is such an attractive feature of one of the most precious areas of English landscape, the Peak district.

Highways Agency

1.30 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I am pleased to have this debate, which will touch on some important issues for constituents throughout the country.

It is worth reflecting briefly on the fact that transport is an important and often overlooked part of our national life. When we get it right, it contributes to economic prosperity and social justice, helps businesses grow and flourish and helps people get to work available outside their area. It is important that we get it right as a country, because there are significant problems when we do not.

I want to cover three areas in this debate. First, I should like to review a scheme that the Highways Agency undertook in my constituency, formerly known as the Dunstable A5 queue relocation scheme. Secondly, I shall deal briefly with the work of the Highways Agency in widening the M1 and how that links with the building of the Dunstable northern bypass. Thirdly, I shall briefly touch on section 14 notices as they are put into place by the Highways Agency.

To start with, I should like to review what happened when the Highways Agency came into my constituency to undertake a scheme to relieve traffic congestion in the centre of Dunstable. Of course, it came with the best intentions. Anyone who knows Dunstable, Houghton Regis, or the surrounding villages, which suffer from rat-running, will know that the area has suffered from terrible congestion for a long time. Indeed, the first reference I found to this was an article in the Daily Mail from 1924 about the traffic bottleneck in Dunstable. My constituents are patient people who have waited a long time for relief. The instinct to do something was clearly there.

I am concerned that the Highways Agency introduced a scheme, but did not talk to local people—local councillors—who have a wealth of experience with this issue. It introduced its own scheme and told us that it was going to do it; there was no option and very little collaboration and the result has not been good. It is not just me saying that. I was so angry and upset by what happened that I asked the Public Accounts Committee to look into it.

I pay tribute to the National Audit Office, which produced a full report of some eight pages or so, looking at exactly what the Highways Agency did. It is important that lessons are learned. I think that we all accept that things go wrong in public life. We are not perfect as individuals and no Department or agency can get everything right; we understand that. However, where precious public money is involved, it is important that we learn lessons when things go wrong, so we do not repeat the same mistakes in future. I look to the Minister to give me, my constituents and people throughout the country some comfort in his reply.

I should like to go into a little detail on what happened in Dunstable. I shall quote some brief passages from the NAO report. Some £2 million was spent on the scheme—a not insignificant sum—but the NAO says, among other things, that there has been an increase in the number of accidents in Dunstable town centre in the first year of the scheme's operation. Air quality, which is an important consideration for people living in towns near major roads, has got worse at the Church street and West street crossroads. Unbelievably, for a scheme that was introduced to reduce congestion, the estimated total additional journey time has increased. The NAO calculates that there has been some 126,000 hours of extra queuing by motorists in the scheme's first year of operation.

The scheme was hugely over budget. The costs for preparation and design and for site supervision were 146 per cent. and 1,185 per cent. above budget respectively. There was no partnership of any description between the Highways Agency and local councils and, most worrying of all, the NAO says that despite the agency's having experienced the NAO crawling all over what happened in Dunstable, there are no plans to share the experience gained from the scheme with other agency area teams, even though the agency has undertaken similar schemes in other parts of the country, such as on the A663 in Oldham.

Next week, in the Budget, many Departments will rightly be looking for extra cash to fund important schemes and, as we all know, they will not get everything that they want. The question of value for money—only spending a budget when there is something worth while to spend it on—could not be more important. My constituents are particularly upset about that. We are being denied roads that we desperately need, on which there is nearly 100 per cent. consensus, and money has been wasted in Dunstable. I am worried, as I will explain shortly, that there will be a £10 million waste of public funds in another area.

I return briefly to the NAO report, which said there was no true partnership with local councils. The area did not build an area-wide traffic model and so was not able fully to represent the effects of rat-running, which we all know can be upsetting for urban residents. Local stakeholders told the NAO that air quality has deteriorated. There are significant concerns that the Highways Agency rated this a high-priority scheme, although it became evident fairly early on that that should not be so, and there were no moves to rank or re-evaluate the scheme when problems were identified.

The two studies undertaken by consultants brought in by the Highways Agency after the end of the project—Carillion-URS and Atkins—did not consult local councils and stakeholders directly affected by the scheme and did not comment on some of the Highways Agency's original objectives for the scheme, which is extraordinary. Most worrying of all, however, the NAO said that there were no plans to share the experience gained from the Dunstable scheme with other area teams. Following the completion of the Dunstable project, another Highways Agency scheme on the A663 in Oldham was completed on 31 March 2005, using the same technology employed in Dunstable. That says to me that we have an organisation that is not learning from its mistakes and not intending to change the way it operates. Although I shall listen to the Minister, perhaps this Government agency could do with a little bit more ministerial supervision and scrutiny.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate, which I applied for as well.

In general terms, my experience in working towards dualling the A47 in East Anglia has meant a great deal of frustration in dealing with the Department for Transport and the Highways Agency, and the east of England now has a board considering that. Specifically, however, to reinforce what my hon. Friend said, Norfolk county council had a major disappointment when it was enlarging and improving the Thickthorn roundabout, south of Norwich on the A11-A47. Having agreed to the scheme, the Highways Agency demanded, after it had begun, a range of additional things running to several hundreds of thousands of pounds. That is unacceptable.

Andrew Selous: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because I do not for a moment believe that what has happened in my constituency is an isolated case. I am explaining some of the public spending in my constituency, but if what has happened there is reflected around the country to the extent that my hon. Friend says it is reflected in his constituency, the sums become very serious, and that really worries me. The important issue is that roads that are desperately needed are not being built because money is being wasted and not being properly supervised.

Another massive concern for my constituents is the fact that we are looking at a six-year delay in the building of the Dunstable northern bypass, announced in the Commons in 2003 by the Minister's boss, the Secretary of State for Transport. He said that the bypass would be open to traffic in 2010–11, and that is the time plan to which the Highways Agency is working. However, we know from the regional planning panel of the East of England regional assembly that there will not be the money to build the road until 2015–16.

That worries my constituents hugely because an additional 43,000 houses are due to be built in my constituency. I hope that no one loses sight of the fact that the Dunstable northern bypass is being built to remedy an infrastructure deficit. We have been waiting for it for 80 years, but it is to deal with problems as they are now. The prospect of another 43,000 houses without that road is too bleak for any of my constituents to contemplate.

What really concerns me is a matter that came to my attention just a few weeks ago. As I understand the situation, the plans to widen the M1 will be carried out without putting in the necessary connecting junction for the Dunstable northern bypass. I understand that that will mean the loss of a £10 million saving; the cost of the bypass will therefore be £10 million more. The bypass is scheduled to cost £77 million. It is not a cheap scheme, and my worry is that that extra cost—or the lack of the saving—could delay it still further.

It seems that there is no joined-up thinking on this issue. What is the point of widening the M1 if that bypass junction, which we accept cannot be built immediately, is not put in? I hope that I have been misinformed and that no final decisions have been made. However, to waste £10 million, or to cause an extra £10 million to be spent to build a road that is going to be built anyway, would be extraordinary and cause me further worries about the operation of the Highways Agency.

When I was preparing for this debate yesterday evening, I was contacted unexpectedly by the North East chamber of commerce, which expressed great concern about how the Highways Agency is imposing section 14 notices. There is a lack of co-ordination between the Department for Transport and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. Section 14 notices allow the Highways Agency to ban development if it thinks that the roads would not be able to cope. That is sensible; none of us wants to see roads built that are so congested that they cannot cope. However, if the ODPM is planning for major jobs growth and housing expansion and the Highways Agency at the Department for Transport is working against that, that is a concern and needs to be looked at. There are strong similarities in my own area in Bedfordshire, where a large amount of housing is planned but the roads issues are unresolved.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate.

In Kettering and north Northamptonshire, we are suffering from that section 14—also known as article 14—problem. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has put local authorities under a statutory duty to approve tens of thousands of new houses. The Highways Agency, as a statutory consultee, is saying, "Fine—go ahead and build the houses when planning permission is granted." However, after the permission has been granted, the agency serves the article 14 directions limiting the number of new houses that can be built.

Andrew Selous: I shall end at this point. I am grateful to my hon. Friend; his contribution is useful because we have now had examples from four parts of the country, including the north-east, where there are significant problems. That should tell the Minister that such problems are not local or particular, but of general application. I look forward to hearing what he has to say.

1.45 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bayley. This has been my first opportunity to do so since you joined the Chairmen's Panel.

I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) on securing this debate. I shall deal with the issues in respect of Dunstable last, after I have cleared away the others.

Article 14 notices are the Highways Agency's mechanism for gathering the information that it needs from people applying for planning permission for development. When somebody applies for planning permission, the notices are effectively the agency's only tool for saying, "We have some highways concerns and we expect them to be addressed". Such concerns are addressed usually by providing information, but sometimes by providing the resources to carry out a piece of work.

The article 14 notice is the Highways Agency's legal mechanism for saying, "We do not have all the information we need," or, "We are not happy with this planning proposal." There is nothing underhand about such notices; they are given very publicly. In the north-east of England, there has been a great deal of fuss about them, and it has been almost entirely unfair as far as the Highways Agency is concerned.

The developments that we are talking about are very large and would impinge greatly on the trunk road network. Before it gives the go-ahead, the Highways Agency has an absolute duty to make the developers work to provide information about what the impact of their development would be on the trunk road. In almost every case, the developer does the work after the article 14 notices have been placed. One could argue that it ought to have done that before making its planning application, but sometimes developers do not because they hope to save a bit of money.

The developers do the work and the article 14 notice is lifted. Sometimes what is required is not information, but a green travel plan that needs to be put in to minimise the impact on the trunk road network; sometimes the notice is served to stump up money for a junction improvement. However, article 14 notices are almost always lifted.

I hope that that puts the issue of article 14 notices into perspective. Such a notice may well have been used in respect of the roundabout mentioned by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), although I am not certain about that. If he wants to give me further details about that particular scheme, I shall be happy to look into it for him.

Likewise, I suspect that there has been some misunderstanding on the part of the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) about how the article 14 notice was used on the occasion that he mentioned. A major housing development will always have an impact on the trunk road network and some work will always have to be done to understand that impact and come up with a strategy for dealing with it. I have no doubt that the article 14 notice there will be lifted when everybody understands what issues have to be addressed. However, if the hon. Gentleman wants to write to me on the matter, I shall be happy to look into it.

I turn to the issue of the A5 and M1. The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire is right to say that we asked the regions for advice about their spending priorities. We do not have enough money to implement all the transport schemes that people want undertaken all at once. Usually, Ministers have to prioritise them; sitting in London, we are not very good at making priorities for regions that are many miles from our constituencies, so we have asked the regions to give us that advice.

I shall not comment on the advice that we have received in respect of the A5 and M1, because we shall make the relevant announcements shortly. However, if the road scheme that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about has been put back in the priorities, as he suggested, and if, as a result of that, we were to lose synergy with a parallel project on, for example, the M1,

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

I would have to take that into consideration when I decide on the priorities. The advice is from the regions, but Ministers make the decisions. The Secretary of State and I will make the decision, and, if we find that there would be a major cost disbenefit in delaying the project, we would have to think about bringing it forward. We may decide that we have to delay it, but we would look for other ways to deal with the cost implications.

Andrew Selous: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for those comments. I accept that he cannot say more than that at present, but what he has said is reassuring and encouraging.

Dr. Ladyman: As the hon. Gentleman said, the problems of Dunstable go back a long way. According to my notes, they go back to the 1990s. I had not realised that it was the 1920s. I suspect that the solution that was envisaged in the 1920s was somewhat different from the one that we are considering today.

I begin this section of my comments by acknowledging that the Highways Agency made an error—there is no question about that. It has admitted that it made mistakes with the scheme. It engaged in a consultation and agreed objectives with the local community for resolving the congestion problems in Dunstable. It then developed a design of the scheme that would best achieve the objectives, but it changed them—not dramatically, but it did change them.

The objectives were changed in various subtle but significant ways. The agency's error was that it did not return to the local community, consult again and agree on a new plan based on the new objectives. It went ahead and designed a scheme that addressed the new objectives but did not take the local community with it. As a consequence, the local community is upset with what happened.

Andrew Selous: With the benefit of hindsight, would the Minister agree that it would have been better not to have spent the money but to have saved it and put it towards road schemes that are needed and which everyone agrees should be built?

Dr. Ladyman: I shall be honest with the hon. Gentleman and admit that I have not studied sufficiently closely the benefits of the scheme as it has been developed to be able to say whether there has been any cost benefit. The scheme may well have achieved other objectives that are, perhaps, not of interest to his constituents. It seems that the objectives were more for the benefit of the trunk road network than for Dunstable. Therefore, although the community's view may be that the money has been wasted, it is possible that there has still been a benefit for the trunk road network. I do not have an answer, but if the hon. Gentleman believes that the project has been a waste of money, that perception is truth to him. I accept that entirely.

The Highways Agency admitted that it made a mistake in the way that it consulted on the project, and it is trying to learn some lessons from it. The hon. Gentleman is right: there is a National Audit Office report. It is in draft form at present but is shortly to be published and put into the public domain. I have no doubt that it will deal with areas of learning that the Highways Agency needs to pick up on and ensure are more widely spread.

As a general principle, I insist that the Highways Agency tries to work as closely as possible with local communities. I also insist that it tries, wherever possible, to drive down costs and not waste public money, and to take into consideration the impact of any proposed scheme on local authority roads around the trunk road network. The agency must take communities along with it.

Thorough consultation must be the order of the day. The agency should agree objectives with the local community and then deliver those objectives. It is unacceptable for it to change the rules after a consultation and not go back to the local community. The agency will be the first to agree that that is the situation. It believes that there have been some benefits from the scheme as delivered, but it accepts that it got this project wrong and that it should have gone back to the local community for proper consultation.

If it is of any comfort to the hon. Gentleman, I can tell him that the lessons are being spread around the rest of the Highways Agency, which is now trying to work closely with local highway authorities in Bedfordshire, particularly in respect of Dunstable. It is examining the timings of traffic lights and how the scheme as it was developed can be improved. It is looking for other things that could be done to try to achieve some of the objectives that the local community set in the first place.

The agency held up its hands and admitted that it got it wrong on this occasion. It will learn from that and do what it can to try to put things right. Other than that, there is little more that I can add on behalf of the agency. If the hon. Gentleman has further concerns as the agency and the local community continue to discuss the matter, I would be happy to try to assist him with them.

Andrew Selous: I am most grateful for the general tenor of the Minister's remarks, which I appreciate very much. Before we conclude, I would be grateful if he could elaborate a little more on the mechanisms that have been put in place across the Highways Agency to try to ensure that such mistakes do not happen in the future, that lessons are learned and that precious public money is not wasted.

Dr. Ladyman: Various processes of consultation take place. To some extent, they are determined by the size and location of the scheme. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of nationally important, high-profile schemes. For example, we are doing early work to decide on new capacity for the M6 between the midlands and the north-west. We will engage in high-profile consultations with stakeholders from an early stage in the process to try to come up with design strategies that people will support. Another scheme that he will be aware of is the current consultation, which has probably been going on even longer than the one for Dunstable, to find a solution to the issues around Stonehenge. That is one level of consultation to try to find a solution. It begins at an early stage, even before design work has been done.

With local schemes, there is active effort to engage local councils, local business representatives and Members of Parliament. I insist that the Highways Agency keeps MPs informed so that they can provide feedback. Regional development agencies and the regional assemblies are also important stakeholders in such issues. There is a wide-ranging attempt to try to agree objectives, to come up with designs that meet those objectives and then to share the designs with the local community before the agency gets to the firm planning and public inquiry stages. Of course, all those things increase the time that it takes to develop schemes. I often find myself facing criticism from Members that the process is taking too long, not that the consultation has not been thorough enough.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied with the assurance that we are trying to develop better ways of consulting local communities, and the admission that the agency got it wrong on this occasion and will do better next time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

9.30 am

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): Before I get on to bus deregulation, I want to say I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Minister is retiring from the job. I wish her well in what she does in future. In the surprisingly long time—22 years—that I have been dealing with Transport Ministers, I have come across some, from both main parties, who were less than competent, and I am pleased to say that my hon. Friend is not like that. She has done a good job. Although I suspect that we shall not see eye to eye in this morning's debate, I am sorry to see her go and wish her well.

The purpose of the debate is to explore why, in the part of the public transport system provided by buses, which account for 84 or 85 per cent. of journeys in the system, there is effectively an apartheid regime between London and the rest of the country. I should like to use our time to see whether there is any justification for maintaining one system in London, which works, produces good public transport and benefits passengers, and another system in the rest of the country that has the opposite impact.

We have already convinced the vast majority of Members of Parliament outside London that their constituents would benefit from a regulated system. Last autumn, Communicate Research did a survey of all MPs and found that 84 per cent. of Labour MPs and a majority of Members of Parliament were in favour of extending to the rest of the country the regulated system found in London. The only thing to surprise me about that was that only 84 per cent. of Labour MPs responded in that way. I have never found one who did not want regulation in the passenger transport and shire areas of the country.

The background is that, in London, bus use is increasing, and in every region in England it is in decline. The most dramatic decline is in south Yorkshire where, since deregulation, bus use has dropped by 62 per cent., which is extraordinary. It is not a matter of an even spread of usage—the people who use buses are among the poorest in the country. Nine out of 10 people who use buses are in the bottom income bracket, and 60 per cent. of bus users have no access to cars. Therefore, if something goes wrong with the bus system, we are allowing the mechanisms that increase social exclusion to continue to operate.

I cannot talk about the regulated system in London as being more effective and producing better public transport without talking about the increasing funding gap. I shall mention it only once. Over the past seven years, in the north-west, although similar statistics will be found in every region, capital expenditure—not the revenue for buses—has risen from £157 million to £295 million, whereas in London it has risen from £226 million to £667 million. That is another background unfairness.

Before I try to analyse the possible reasons for what has happened, I should like to give some statistics. I suspect that I could spend the whole hour and a half available to us giving out appalling statistics about transport usage, but I want to use the headline figures showing the changes that have happened, and to ask why they have been allowed and how we can stop the process going further.

Fares in the English passenger transport executive areas have gone up 86 per cent. since deregulation. In London, they have gone up 36 per cent. Over the past five years, fares in the PTE areas have gone up 9 per cent. In London, they have gone down 4 per cent. Patronage since deregulation across all the PTE areas has gone down by about half. In London, it has gone up by just over half. In the past five years, patronage in the PTE areas has gone down 8 per cent. whereas it has gone up more than a third in London.

We need to understand why there has been such a dramatic difference between London and the rest of the country. I do not believe that it is justifiable, but we should consider ministerial responses to the figures and some statements from officials. The Government have three responses to the shocking figures that I have mentioned. One is that we are not going back to pre-1985 days and re-regulation. That is a complete red herring. I have never heard anyone say, in the debate on this matter that has been going on as long as there has been deregulation, that they want buses brought back into public ownership and a return to the exact regulation that existed before 1985. What most of us want is a system similar to London's, or preferably a better one, because when a system is adopted it can be improved.

Secondly, the Secretary of State for Transport regularly points out success stories. His favourites seem to be York, Oxford, Brighton and Cambridge. He asks why, if those towns or small cities can improve patronage on their buses, big areas such as Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool and Newcastle cannot. There is one obvious reason. His examples are much smaller areas, dominated in nearly every case by one operator, with one centre, so that traffic restraint can work—people do not have much of a choice in those areas.

That situation can be compared with what happens in a polycentric urban conurbation such as Manchester. The city of Manchester has the highest percentage bus usage of any of the metropolitan areas, but Bury, which my constituency borders, has one of the lowest in the country. It is necessary to take account of different circumstances when attempting to make like-with-like comparisons. The west midlands and Greater Manchester clearly have much more in common with the London conurbation than with York or Cambridge, which are much smaller.

Do the people in those towns like what is happening? I suspect not. A letter to the York Evening Press from Chris Nelson, complaining bitterly about price increases that he had to pay in York, asked

"are these higher fares just because First is the only bus operator in York, and people such as the elderly, single parents, or others on low incomes have no other choice of transport?

Park and Ride fares in York are simply extortionate—no other way of putting it. You have to pay the equivalent of a day ticket just for a return fare."

[Graham Stringer]

He goes on to say that the system in York does not work. It is, therefore, neither wonderful nor comparable, and it is not a good reason for saying that the same could happen in Greater Manchester.

The third ministerial reason is that London is different, and it is—it is about two and a half times larger than Greater Manchester or the west midlands. In terms of buses, however, it was no different before regulation, and the real change is that there is now a regulated system in London and a deregulated system outside. Before deregulation, 48 per cent. of all public transport journeys were in the PTE areas and about 27 per cent. were in London. That situation has reversed, with nearly half of bus journeys in London and only 27 per cent. in the PTE areas. That is a dramatic switch round. Comparable areas, which had similar penetrations of bus usage, are now completely different. One reason for that is the regulated system, and the other is that there is three times more subsidy per passenger in London than in the rest of the country. Those, then, are the ministerial reasons.

I advise hon. Members who want to understand some of the thinking of the Department for Transport to get hold of a transcript of the Public Accounts Committee's proceedings on 23 January. At that sitting, the Committee gently kebabed the permanent secretary at the Department. He is a good civil servant, and I make no criticism of him. Indeed, he is a man of integrity and intelligence, but he was trying to defend what is more or less indefensible. He did not quite plead the fifth amendment, but in many cases he pleaded ignorance of what is happening to transport in our major urban conurbations. Let me go through some of the reasons that he gave.

First, the permanent secretary said that local authorities in PTE and passenger transport authority areas would begin to have a service similar to that in London if they would only restrain car use, but that is not really the case. Greater Manchester is spending about £50 million on quality bus corridors, and other urban conurbations are doing the same. However, because the system is deregulated, the bus companies are moving on to the radial routes to make bigger profits, and the network is contracting. Although passenger usage on the radial routes might increase, therefore, there will be a worse service for some of the poorest people in the country

Incidentally, the Government are tough in assessing the benefits of investment in public transport systems such as Metrolink, but no real assessment is done of the usefulness of investment in quality bus corridors, or of whether such corridors improve public transport—the idea that they will bring about improvements is an article of faith in the deregulated, privatised system. In the light of the facts, however, that is not a belief that I share. One justification that Mr. Rowlands, the permanent secretary, uses is that quality bus corridors will help to get rid of congestion, and that is what has happened in London. However, the Department's answers to parliamentary questions show that two thirds of bus delays are caused not by congestion, but by the unreliability of private buses—they simply do not turn up.

The permanent secretary also says that, although there might be concentrations of bus usage, there are almost guaranteed to be three bids for subsidised routes. However, that is completely wrong. Many of the subsidised routes that PTEs put out to tender are simply not bid for. In Greater Manchester and the other PTE areas, there is only one bidder for many routes. The cost of such tenders has gone up by about 20 per cent.

Arriva, which is no different from the four other major bus companies that dominate the industry, makes no secret of what it is doing. In answer to questions at the Public Accounts Committee, the permanent secretary said that those bus companies were "economically rational" and "passenger maximising", but they are not. They are certainly profit maximising, but that is not the same thing. If they can concentrate their services along routes from which others have been cleared by means of bus priority measures, they will make their profits there and remove their buses from other areas. Although the permanent secretary seemed to be wilfully ignorant of that, Arriva's half-year report stated:

> "Outside London our approach, to what is currently a mature market, is to focus on a twin-track strategy of targeting investment to deliver growth and eliminating low margin and loss-making routes."

That means that companies will remove routes on which they make a certain amount of money. The 53 route in Manchester, which was there for 80 years and always had good patronage, has just gone. Instead, companies will run routes up and down the main radial routes, which is bad for public transport.

Whichever way we look at the Department's analysis—that there will be more bids, that there is competition and that quality bus corridors will be the solution—it does not fit with the facts. Should not the permanent secretary understand that, in a market in which the private sector is exploiting the people I represent, bus companies make 50 per cent. of their profits on only 25 per cent. of their business? That should, at least, be cause for concern. The Department said that it did not understand that and that it was not aware of those figures, and I would be happy to give officials the references for all the sources of information in my speech at the end of the debate if the Department is willing to listen.

On the subject of listening, I have tabled parliamentary questions to ask how many times the Department meets individual bus companies and officials and members of PTAs and PTEs. I have been told that meetings happen regularly, but I am rather interested in how often they take place, because there is evidence that Government policy is biased towards the private bus industry and against public officials from PTEs. I therefore ask the Minister whether officials will meet PTE members and whether detailed figures will be given out.

We have reached an extraordinary situation. I have been in favour of buses all my political life because the people I have represented as a councillor and a Member of Parliament have needed them. However, the system that now operates in metropolitan areas means that being in favour of buses is not the same as being in favour of public transport—they can be quite different things. Bus priority measures can be introduced, but the public transport system will get worse. That is quite a shocking state of affairs.

At the same time, the private companies are demanding more public money. Some £2 billion is going into the bus industry and the companies' profits are going up, but the service outside London is getting worse. Brian Souter of Stagecoach attacks all the PTEs because passenger numbers are going down, but, at the same time, he has his begging bowl out. Like most private sector bus company operators, he says, "You're not doing anything, so please build us park-and-ride schemes with your own money." If the private-sector bus industry were really creative and innovative, it would find those resources itself, instead of making returns on capital in the PTE of more than 50 per cent.—another fact of which Mr. Rowlands was not aware.

A number of other hon. Members want to speak, so I will finish by asking how we can justify a situation in which the travelling public in areas such as Greater Manchester and South Yorkshire have to face four fare increases a year. In London, they face one increase a year—or one fare adjustment, because sometimes the fares in London go down. How can it be good for public transport when in the past four years there have been 9,000 service changes in Greater Manchester? I assume that the figures are similar in other areas. Most people who want to increase bus patronage recognise that reliability and stability in the network are important factors. People need to know where the buses are going, but 9,000 service changes is instability of an extraordinary kind, which leads people to invest in cars and not go on buses.

How can we justify not doing anything about a system in which punctuality in virtually all PTE areas is 76 per cent. and reliability is only 92 per cent.? Those shocking figures are mostly down to the companies, not conditions on the road. How can we justify investing £2 billion but not looking at how we target the operators' grant money? We just pay it out, but do not try to use the tiny levers that are left to get a public transport system. The money is paid out without any controls at all. How can we justify having underfunded, under-resourced traffic commissioners, while companies such as FirstGroup have failed and have had to have hearings and investigations into their failures? The system means that traffic commissioners have to take services off, which is not good for the travelling public, even if they were poor services. When services are taken off in the north of England, FirstGroup registers a subsidiary and carries on as before, with its unreliable, unsatisfactory services.

I do not see how any of that is justifiable. Our public transport system is going in the wrong direction. Most of the evidence is that our urban areas compete effectively internationally if they have good public transport systems. The situation is a brake on what they are doing, and I am worried that we are going in the wrong direction.

Last year, at the request and subsidy of Services Employees International Union, a north American trade union, I went to the States to see how FirstGroup and other bus companies operated, and I was quite shocked. The safety record of the bus companies in this country is not good—I think that 15 per cent. of buses that are stopped by the commissioners have to be taken off the road immediately for being unsafe—but what is happening in the United States is worse. I do not want us to go down that route. I have tabled questions and asked for guarantees that, if we go to a yellow bus service, we will not follow the route that FirstGroup has taken in the United States.

I know that the Minister has a brief and is in the last days of being a Minister in the Department, but I ask her to accept that the situation is not justified. None of us wants to return to the 1984 system, which was not as responsive as it should have been, but we do want value for the £2 billion that is invested. We want local control, so that we can say to our constituents, "This is a public transport system that will get you to work on time." Constituents of mine have lost their jobs or not got to hospital for important appointments because FirstGroup did not turn up, at the same time as its profits are increasing. That is simply unacceptable. I hope that the Minister will be as positive as she can be in response to those points.

9.55 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I thank the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) for raising this crucial issue, which matters a lot to people throughout the PTE areas and beyond. I reiterate his comments about the Minister, because I have always found her to be extraordinarily helpful and a model of courtesy with all hon. Members. She has not let power in any sense turn her head and will, I am sure, remain precisely the same person when she resigns from the ministerial ranks.

There is a quotation, I think from the former Duchess of Westminster, to the effect that anybody on a bus after the age of 30 is a failure. On Monday, coming home after our vote on identity cards, I made use of my Oyster card. It was the first time I had gone home at night on the bus. The bus—the 77A—arrived promptly at 11.15 pm. I got on it, used my Oyster card and found that it was full of a range of people, all of whom were perfectly happy and amicable. I travelled quickly, made a five-minute journey to my destination, got off and was within a few yards of my flat.

I compare that with the experience that I commonly have at home, where I rarely use the bus service. Why? Because throughout Merseyside buses are, by and large, infrequent and expensive, especially for families. The age profile is quite different. The nice thing about getting on a bus in parts of Merseyside is that one never feels old, because almost 80 per cent. of the passengers are pensioners using free travel, which for years the council tax payer has funded. In some ways that is a bracing experience, and quite different from being on a tube in London, where one can sometimes look along a carriage and find oneself the oldest person in it. None the less, the climate is completely different.

Another reason for not using the buses locally is that the routes are often indirect, and my experience with buses in other cities does not encourage me further. For reasons that hon. Members will be able conjecture, a year or so ago I got a bus to Hodge Hill in Birmingham. I was surprised to find myself the only person on a full bus to be wearing a suit, collar and tie. There was a definitely a class element to bus use in that area, which does not exist in London.

One could argue that there is a big subsidy in London, public control and elements of car restraint, for example. I do not have a car parking place at my flat, which encourages me to use the bus. However, in areas such as Merseyside, we see a dire, depressing and declining picture. Eighty per cent. of the routes in Merseyside are straightforwardly commercial and 20 per cent. are subsidised. Two companies—Arriva and Stagecoach—operate 90 per cent. of the routes, with some small companies around the edges.

Over the past 10 years, the number of passengers using supported routes has increased by about 4 million, but the number of people using commercial routes has declined drastically by 37 million. It has gone down by 20 per cent., but there has been no change in mileage. The buses are going round as per usual, but they are going round with greater cost and fewer passengers. Supported mileage has increased dramatically since 2000, by about 2 million miles. The subsidy has tripled and the cost per mile of running a bus has doubled.

That is largely because of the commercial operators pulling out and deciding that they do not want to run routes that are not profitable enough. Often, when Merseyside PTA tries to work round that, it uses circuitous routes to satisfy passengers and the paying public. Contrary to expectations, during local transport plan 1, the bus fleet, commercial and other, on average got older. That is despite substantial publicity for public transport on Merseyside and substantial investment by the PTE in infrastructure. There was substantial innovation in, for example, the use of LPG vehicles and bus lanes proliferated galore. Clearly something is not working. I have no reason to believe that things are working a great deal better in Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle or Sheffield. That seems to be the general story since privatisation.

We have gone for and are trying unsuccessfully to thrive with a market model for public transport. The key to improvement, if there is to be improvement, is thought to be competition. The enticement for all Governments is that improvement via competition will negate the need for subsidy, so that subsidies can be reserved for other services—for example, buses in and through deprived areas and the rural bus grant. Essentially, it is a market-driven model or, to be more precise, a profit-led model. It is not a demand-led model. In many cities and towns such as Southport, which I represent, there is a huge demand for late-night public transport to take people back from clubs, pubs and so on, but it is simply not provided. It does not suit the operators to provide it, or perhaps it is problematic, but it is a real social need and there is a real public demand.

The model does not work because, in many places, as other hon. Members are likely to say, there is nothing like real competition; it is more like cartels. From time to time, the bus operators have been referred to the rather limp-wristed Office of Fair Trading when there seems to be a local monopoly in a particular area. It points out that another operator, perhaps 20 or 30 miles away, can be used if someone wants to travel 20 or 30 miles to avail themselves of a bus for which they have no real need. The OFT's rather limp-wristed response has not allowed the benign effects of competition to kick in.

That is all against a background of the Government not, strictly speaking, leaving the market alone. They allow subsidies by passenger transport executives; they allow traffic regulations to impose bus lanes; they allow companies to receive profits. They essentially preside over the situation. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley pointed out, it is apparent that bus ridership has fallen and the only saving grace for the Government is in London where the situation has been sustained and has improved.

People have despaired of public transport and have found that travelling by car has not become more expensive. The cost of car ownership relative to bus ridership has fallen. Increasing environmental concern has changed the degree of Government tolerance. Furthermore, in some cities, the use of cars has made congestion intolerable even for car users. I know that the Government are having a rethink; I know from veiled comments by the Secretary of State for Transport recently that he is having a rethink.

What appears to have prompted that rethink as much as anything else is the prospect of rolling out congestion charging throughout the country. People know that congestion charging works in London but it works because there is a tube system, a good, affordable bus system and good public transport infrastructure. That does not exist in other conurbations, so the people who would suffer most from congestion charging would be those with less money. They could not easily afford the congestion charge but they would have to use their cars to go to work if there were no public transport system, and they would pay a substantial premium for doing so.

The Government are linking the transport innovation fund—a big pot of gold that local authorities can try to dip into and that carries with it the requirement of making the right noises on congestion charging—with some latitude on the development of quality bus contracts and quality bus partnerships. They seem infatuated with the idea that congestion charging is a solution to congestion. They accept that something must be done about buses. I believe that they will do something about that in the not-too-distant future. I hope that this debate helps them to proceed more quickly with the process of rethinking.

I do not believe that congestion charging and quality bus partnerships, or increasing regulation are necessarily the Siamese twins that the Government believe them to be. I think I am right that, before we had congestion charging in London, the figures for London bus use were enviable compared with the rest of the country and rising. All along, with and without congestion charging, it has had greater public control and substantial public subsidy. I think that London might thrive without the current level of subsidy. Things could improve substantially so that it did not need the current level of subsidy. That could be due to increased ridership, with people such as me starting to use buses, increased efficiency with new buses, and increased familiarity. Many people do not use buses because they do not know where they go. They have the unnerving feeling that they will be whisked far away into the distance and have a longer walk than they would have had to start with.

In the House of Commons and among the wider public, everyone says that they believe in public transport. It is a nostrum from which no one demurs. No one, except perhaps the former Duchess of Westminster, says that public transport is a bad thing. I am not sure that we all believe passionately in the public actually using public transport, but there is clearly no point in having it if it does not entice the public out of their cars and encourage what is today called modal shift. There are clear gains for the environment and in terms of congestion. Strangely, there is also a forgotten gain—some of us are old enough to remember it—of social cohesion. When one gets on a bus and finds that it is not full of people waiting to attack with knives, one starts to talk to other people. That is not a bad thing for society. We have talked about social exclusion, but social cohesion is a strange and incidental by-product of people using public transport, except on the London underground, where protocol demands that people talk to absolutely no one for fear of being thought to be insane.

It is self-evident that the Government's public transport policy on buses so far has produced a flat zero in modal shift outside London. They already have some regulation and use economic levers, so they must consider how they can use regulation and economic levers better. This is not a plea for nationalisation because buses never were nationalised. It is false to suggest that there was an age when the municipal authority provided the entire pubic transport infrastructure. I was brought up in Liverpool where Ribble, Crossville and Liverpool city council bus companies provided popular services and people did not discriminate between private and public providers. We are talking realism. The situation requires that something be done. It is demonstrable that the current economic and legal levers are insufficient. If that does not change, public transport in general will deteriorate.

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): Three hon. Members have indicated that they wish to speak. The wind-ups will start at 10.30 so perhaps hon. Members will be brief.

10.9 am

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): I add my congratulations to those already been expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this debate, and I echo the kind comments that have been made about the Minister. Those of us who have been pursuing this matter for some time will probably have to go through the process again with her successor.

I shall try to reduce the length of my speech by missing out some of the statistics that my hon. Friend used. In west Yorkshire where I come from, it is clear that quality and standards have fallen dramatically since deregulation. Fares have risen by almost 50 per cent. in real terms and the number of passengers has fallen by 40 per cent. However, as he said, the position in west Yorkshire is probably far better than in the other passenger transport executive areas, where patronage has fallen overall by 48 per cent.

The experience in my constituency, as in so many others, is that companies can pick and choose what services they provide, and that they make escalating profits while providing a poor service. Services are chopped and changed, buses are missing or late, and passengers feel angry and powerless about that, for all the reasons that my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) analysed quite forensically. Passengers turn to Metro, their MPs or councillors, but find that we are equally powerless in this situation.

In my constituency, there is effectively a monopoly provider in the shape of FirstBus, which operates all the commercial services. Evening and Sunday services are funded by Metro on a subsidised basis. The local network—this picture has been described already—comprises high frequency routes such as service 4 to Pudsey, 16 to Farsley and 42 to Old Farnley, together with a combination of routes on the busy Leeds-Bradford corridor. The remainder of services are attended to largely through Metro.

In the nine years that I have been the MP there, the area has been subjected to successive service changes, all of which were based solely on the generation of profit. As my hon. Friend said, we have moved from a situation in which there were loss-making routes, which were shed by the operators, to one in which the routes are making a profit, but not enough profit in the eves of First.

Recent changes to services such as the 97, 647 and 651 in the Guiseley and Yeadon areas have resulted in a significant reduction in links with nearby Bradford, which is a major urban centre on the doorstep of my constituency. That has caused tremendous hardship for regular users of those services. Through Farsley, there is a regular service every 10 or 15 minutes, yet half a mile away, older people living in a sheltered housing complex have lost their vital link into the Farfield estate.

There is no obligation—we know this full well—on commercial operators to undertake any sort of customer consultation, so links to local facilities such as health centres, post offices and supermarkets are often ignored when operators plan their services. The bus network does not respond to social needs, whether they are long-standing or have emerged over time. It is an indictment of the system that there are no links for, probably, 40 per cent. of the people who use Wharfedale hospital directly from the communities of Horsforth, Yeaden and Guiseley. Recently, a major primary care facility was set up at Eccleshill in Bradford. Its catchment area includes a large proportion of my constituency, but there are no public transport links for them.

Although Metro provides some of the funding for services in my area, constraints on public finance mean that those funds are limited. In the bad old days, as we might refer to them, before regulation, there was a cross-subsidy, and the surpluses made on profitable routes could be reinvested in routes that were socially desirable. Despite its drive to improve profits locally, First seems to be incredibly slow to reinvest in the renewal of its bus fleet. I understand, from Metro, that about 45 per cent. of First's fleet is low-floor and Disability Discrimination Act compliant, and that the average vehicle age is about seven years. That is not the sort of modern-day service that people should have to cope with.

Limited monitoring is available to the Vehicle and Operator Services Agency, which means that much of the monitoring has to be carried out by Metro using manual observation. I understand that First in Leeds operates 99 per cent. of services. Since October 2005, Metro has been increasing the amount of monitoring that it does, the results of which reinforce my hon. Friend's indictment. First in Leeds is operating 79.7 per cent. of services on time—not more than one minute early or five minutes late. That sort of service causes passengers to vote with their feet and, as the hon. Member for Southport says, to opt for other forms of transport, including the private car.

[Mr. Paul Truswell]

Fare levels are controlled by local bus operators, which are therefore in a position to make up for the loss of patronage that they have created by the way in which they have run services, which are also affected by demographic changes, network changes and low-quality service delivery. Between April 2004 and January 2006, in Leeds, First increased off-peak fares by 36 per cent. and peak-time fares by about 11 per cent. Industry cost figures for the period up to June 2005 show a 9 per cent. increase, so we can see that there has been a continued diminution and deterioration of services, but constant profit and growing fares.

As my hon. Friend said, the Government often talk about contestability and value for money, especially in relation to education, schools and the NHS, and the public sector is forced to compete with the private sector. In west Yorkshire—and, I suspect, in other PTE areas—we do not have a market that promotes competition and efficiency, and drives down costs. We have a system that promotes inefficiency and drives up costs. Metro PTE is able to influence directly only about 20 per cent. of the services for which it provides a subsidy. There is little competition for tenders, so it is difficult to test value for money. In west Yorkshire, in the 12 months to September 2005, of the 87 contracts for local bus services that Metro offered to companies, 70 were returned with a single bid, although every contract was bid for, unlike in my hon. Friend's area.

Since 2002, lost mileage on tendered services has more than doubled in west Yorkshire. Tendered services usually operate at times of low traffic volume, so congestion is not the reason for lost mileage, although it is often quoted as the reason by operators. That simply is not true in this case.

In her reply to my Adjournment debate last November, my hon. Friend the Minister talked about successful partnerships in Brighton, Cambridge, Nottingham, Oxford, Telford and York, and about impressive growth in areas such as Bedford, Exeter and Peterborough. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley analysed why those comparisons are not appropriate and never will be. That indicates that the Government still have not got to grips with the sophisticated problems facing bus transport in major conurbations. This might be a belated question, but why is it that the Minister and her colleagues can never add Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Newcastle, Liverpool and Manchester to that list? My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley did an admirable job in demonstrating the difference.

The Minister and her colleagues put their faith in partnership and robust second local transport plans. There seems to be a strong assertion, or at least an implication—my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley referred to this—that PTEs should be doing more and that they are deficient, but I am never quite sure what that extra something is supposed to be. I would certainly welcome some enlightenment on that from the Minister, her successor, or anyone else who cares to shed light on the issue.

Partnership can and does work to an extent. It is not as though PTEs such as Metro are not willing to engage in that. In west Yorkshire, we have one of Europe's largest guided busway initiatives, a high occupancy vehicle scheme, and a public transport box in Leeds city centre that has cut journey times on some routes by between 10 and 30 per cent. PTEs are not resistant to partnership, but it simply is not enough. Surveys in west Yorkshire found that one in four frequent bus passengers experienced unacceptable lateness, or the non-showing of vehicles in the previous week, and that 49 per cent. had the same problems in the previous three months. Complaints to Metro about bus operators have doubled since 2000. Between 2003 and 2004 alone, complaints increased by 40 per cent.

People often say to MPs about public sector providers such as the NHS, "Eeh, if you ran a business like that, you'd soon be on the rocks." Yet the bus system is a business, and it is being allowed to run like that. It is still not providing the service that our constituents demand. I was going to say a little more about the hurdles that PTEs have to overcome to get quality contracts. The Minister has heard the argument before. The threshold is set too high. The "only practicable way" requirement will simply not be met without a great deal of difficulty and legal challenge. The threshold must be lowered.

I apologise for the time that I have taken, but we have to find a way to achieve a better and fairer balance between passengers and profit.

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): If the remaining Members who wish to speak before the wind-ups try to limit themselves to four minutes, I think we can get them in.

10.21 am

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): I will try to be brief. I must start with an apology. I have to go to a meeting with the Lord Chancellor, and he is not a man who likes to be kept waiting. I apologise to the Minister and to the Opposition spokesmen because I will not hear their winding-up speeches, but I will read them with great interest.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this important debate. It is true that deregulation has been bad for public transport, and I agree with much of what was said by the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh). I suspect that this is one of those debates where there will be a great deal of agreement across the Chamber, at least below the Gangway. We will get to hear what will be said at the other end.

It is certainly true that bus companies tend to have things their own way these days. I agree that something of a cartel is working. In the Tyne and Wear area, Stagecoach and Go North East seem to dominate all the bus services to the exclusion of anyone else. As a result of deregulation, bus use is in serious decline. As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley pointed out, before deregulation, 48 per cent. of English bus trips took place in PTE areas and 27 per cent. in London. Now that has been reversed, with 27 per cent. of English bus trips in PTE areas and 44 per cent. in London. That has to have something to do with the fact that services in London continue to be regulated.

As a result, costs are rising. The price of new tendered local bus services is rising way ahead of inflation. Between 2003 and 2004, the price rose by 12.1 per cent.,

three times the rate of inflation. That was a marginal improvement on the 15 per cent. rise between 2002 and 2003. The result is cuts in services. Approximately 35 per cent. of local authorities planned to make cuts to supported bus services by the end of the 2004–05 financial year in order to stay within budget.

It is not all bad news: there has been very good news for profits. FirstGroup, made a £103 million operating profit from its UK bus division in 2003–04. UK bus operations account for 37 per cent. of FirstGroup's revenue and 48 per cent. of its operating profit. Returns of 11 per cent. on an investment are not unusual in the bus industry. My hon. Friend has referred to returns of as much as 50 per cent. It is indeed a profitable business.

Reliability and the provision of services have suffered, not least in Tyne and Wear. Services west of Gateshead have been cut and priority services have had to be introduced at public cost in order to provide a reasonable service to the people in that area. Passenger journeys in Tyne and Wear have gone down by 56 per cent. since the deregulation of buses. PTEs are struggling to continue to provide decent services for people, as opposed to the profitable services that the bus companies seem exclusively to be interested in. Nowhere is the budget being constrained more than in the Tyne and Wear area.

I refer my hon. Friend the Minister to the problems besetting Tyne and Wear PTE because of the Government's free fare system, which will be introduced in only a few weeks and is exclusively related to bus journeys. In Tyne and Wear, we are now £5.5 million short of the money needed to run free bus services next month. That is a serious problem. In order to make up the shortfall, the PTE will have to use £2 million of its reserves. It will have to cut concessionary fares for young people and students. Next week, it will have to announce cuts in services to pay for that Government-inspired scheme. That cannot be right and it is up to the Government to resolve the problem.

I congratulate the Department for Transport, which has done everything possible to assist. In fact, it has provided £1.7 million to ensure that the free fare system can be transferred on to the metro. If the free fares had exclusively been for buses, the metro system would have suffered badly. That has resolved a problem, but we still have the shortfall to resolve.

I, too, congratulate the Minister on her term of office and I wish her well for the future. Perhaps she could perform one great last service. Next week the Chancellor will announce this year's Budget. As last year's Budget brought in the free fare system, perhaps he could resolve some of the unintended problems with the scheme in this year's Budget.

Not only is there a funding shortfall for the scheme in a number of local authorities, and most seriously in Tyne and Wear, but the scheme is related only to local authority boundaries. That is causing some difficulties. In this year's Budget, the Chancellor—the Minister might have a word with the Treasury—could introduce a national free fare scheme for pensioners. It could be administered by the Department for Transport. In one of its famous meetings with the bus companies, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley referred, it could negotiate to introduce a national system, so that pensioners could use the free pass wherever they went in the country on local bus services. That would be a great service. If the Minister can do that before she leaves, she will be remembered for ever.

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate. Not only has he got me back on the subject of buses, but this is my first Westminster Hall debate, although we are not in Westminster Hall but in Committee Room 10. I am delighted that that is the subject of the debate, because one of my personal projects at the last election was to work with my passenger transport executive, Merseytravel, to secure a form of re-regulation. If I were to quibble about anything about today's debate, it would be the name. Instead of "Buses (Deregulation)", it should be "Buses (Re-regulation)". I would have much preferred a positive slant on the debate.

Why is it that three of my constituents from Upton recently contacted me to tell me that the 497 service from Saughall Massie to Birkenhead had been withdrawn by Arriva? That caused severe hardship to one elderly couple who cannot get to their doctor as they did before. They have to get two bus services, neither of which are particularly reliable. In September last year, constituents from West Kirby were very distressed when the 82 bus service, run by Avon buses, from Heswall to West Kirby was cut in half, making them wait for two hours on that circular route, which is mostly used by the elderly. In October last year, I heard about the number 17 bus service operated by FirstBus, which is regularly late and has led to problems because the gentleman involved cannot get to work properly.

The background as regards Merseytravel and Merseyside has already been given by the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh), so I will not go into that. We receive letters regularly. In my naivety, when I first received letters about such matters, I used to write to the PTE to ask whether it could intervene and do something. It got fed up and said, "Look, Stephen, no, we can't. We can't interfere with commercial services. We can't operate or try to operate those services."

So what is to be done? I want to tread a middle course. I understand that there could almost be a revolution, which would unwind what happened in 1985. I do not think that anyone is arguing for that. My PTE tells me that, under the Transport Act 2000, reluctantly but as positively as it can, it wants to consider quality contracts. I shall pick up from where my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) finished. My local PTE tells me that under—is it section 6? Everyone is looking at me mystified. Are we getting some information?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): Not on that.

Stephen Hesford: In that case, I shall move on. My local PTE says that under the relevant section a quality contract can be used to bring in a form of re-regulation if that is the only practical way to do so. I am told that it is a cumbersome, bureaucratic process, but I am also told that PTEs, working together, are determined to try to crack that nut. I urge my local PTE to do that; in fact,

[Stephen Hesford]

I urge all PTEs to do it, including those in west Yorkshire, the west midlands and the north-east. As I am dipping my toe in the water of this debate, I also ask my hon. Friend the Minister whether any applications—from what I am told, they will come in the summer of this year, so that people can try to make progress in 2008—can be considered sympathetically, rather than bureaucratically.

10.31 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing the debate and on an excellent contribution. I also commend the contributions made by other hon. Members; we have had a very good debate. I, too, send my best wishes to the Minister. I have been in the House only a short time, but I have always found her very courteous. Although we have not always agreed, we have at least had that dialogue, so I wish her well.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley represents an urban constituency, as I do. Some of the examples and statistics that he gave show why deregulation has been a disaster and why we need a change of policy. Buses are important, although they are often treated as the Cinderella of public transport. They are frequently the choice of the majority: 85 per cent. of all public transport journeys are, and will continue to be in the near future, made by bus. If we are to do something about congestion in urban areas, we must deal with some of the problems that hon. Members have raised.

When the Transport Act 1985 was introduced, we saw the privatisation of the National Bus Company and the municipal bus companies—I am thinking of Greater Manchester Buses North and Greater Manchester Buses South—and what was then termed the freeing up of the market. We were promised more competition, better bus services and cheaper fares. However, we have had none of those benefits. Instead, there was a brief period of bus wars. I am sure that we all remember when buses were chasing each other for custom along the road—always along the most profitable routes, not on estates. Those services do not run at times when people without cars need them to run.

That time has gone and what do we have? We have a private monopoly instead of a public monopoly. Although 80 per cent. of all services in PTE areas are commercial services and only 20 per cent. of those are subsidised, 65 per cent. of all bus services in 26 of the 36 metropolitan districts are operated by one bus company. In 17 areas, the figure is 75 per cent. In my constituency of Rochdale, 65 per cent. of all bus services are run by First. In Oldham, the figure is 84 per cent. In Stockport, with Stagecoach, the figure is 81 per cent. In Sefton, with Arriva, the figure is 78 per cent. In Birmingham, National Express has 86 per cent.

A monopoly in itself is not a bad thing, but if we compare the services in PTE areas with what we have in London, we find that they are characterised by four things: frequent fare increases—four increases last year were mentioned—frequent changes in bus timetables, often with little notice; poor reliability and service; and services operated for the benefit of shareholders rather than customers. For example, when Arriva recently announced a fall in profits, primarily because it had lost the northern rail franchise, it said that the bus fares would have to go up. That is not improving the service. That is operating bus services, as has been said, as a cash cow.

Many customer service surveys have shown what we all know: the main concerns of bus users are reliability, punctuality, driver attitudes and service stability. A bus does not turn up only once, and a passenger is lost. If there is to be a modal shift and if we are to meet the target of a 10 per cent. increase in bus use in areas outside London, there must be a change of image and in operation. As we know, that is not happening. We have seen a 19 per cent. fall in bus use in PTE areas; the figure was 3 per cent. last year. At the same time, we have seen a huge increase in bus fares: 86 per cent. between 1985 and 2005. That is not acceptable.

Let us compare the rates of return in PTE areas with that in London. First Manchester's rate of return is 17.8 per cent. Arriva Manchester's is 15.1 per cent. Stagecoach Manchester's is 14.5 per cent. The margin in London is much lower: 8.7 per cent. The situation that I have described cannot continue. We cannot operate a service whereby bus services are changed and fares are increased not to bring about improvements in services but to ensure that profits are protected. If we are to get our city regions operating, we must consider a change in the system.

The Secretary of State said in an answer to a written question from the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley that we could not return to the 1985 situation. As has been said, none of us here wants that. However, we do want quality bus services reliably operated in areas where people need them and at times that will get people out of their cars. If the current system continues, that will not happen.

Quality contracts were mentioned. In answers, the Secretary of State has said that that is the route that we have been going down, but, as has been said, those contracts are extremely difficult and time-consuming to operate. It is pertinent that, since the time to introduce those contracts was reduced last November from 24 to six months, not one contract has yet been applied for. That shows some of the difficulties. The contracts are too complicated; there are too many stipulations. We are told that competition will work, but clearly competition is not working. It is not providing regular public transport.

PTEs need to be able to plan and develop an integrated transport policy. It was said that, with the introduction of congestion charging, that may be possible, but as the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley and my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) said, we have to consider what is happening. I am a member of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority. We have not said that we would oppose such a move. However, we have always said that the public transport network has to be in place before charges are introduced. If not, we will not encourage local people back on to the buses.

We need to consider changing the rules relating to quality contracts. Passenger transport authorities are working on the issue and are committed to introducing quality contracts, but operated as they are currently, they will not be a success. Liberal Democrats want more local decision making. We want PTAs to have the powers that they need to introduce the contracts as part of an integrated transport system. That means similar powers to what exists in London. That is not nationalisation. In 1985, the real difference was not about privatisation or nationalisation; it was about regulation, and that is what we do not have at the moment. We need regulation. Yes, there is the issue of cost. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley said, the costs and subsidy for London are much higher. I am not arguing with that. However, if we consider the bus operators' grant that is paid directly to those companies, and some of the margins that they achieve—the profits of companies in the PTE areas are even more excessive than those made in London—we must be able to find a way of operating a similar service without massive Exchequer input. We must think about that, because we have to have a public transport system if our cities are not to be log-jammed with cars.

The current system is not working. It has failed local people. I hope that, in her last few days in her post, the Minister will set in train a thorough review of the existing situation, which will show her that the private monopolies exist for their own benefit and not that of local people. I hope, too, that the Government will use the information from the review to give us a proper, integrated transport system.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): Like all other hon. Members, I wish the Minister well when she stands down from her Front-Bench role. Today is the first and last time that we shall have the opportunity to debate together. I note that the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) has been consistent on this subject throughout his long period in Parliament. Today, he has been a forceful advocate for his side of the story—indeed, so far we have heard only one side of the story. I should like not only to address that side but to put forward some countervailing points that we need to bear in mind.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) said that this is a debate about public transport, and we all support public transport. That is true, but what we are talking about is how it is delivered, and how it might be improved continually. In 2000, having recognised that bus travel numbers decreased in many previous years, the Government produced the 10-year plan, in which they set themselves the target of increasing bus journeys by 10 per cent. by 2010. They also said that they wished to improve the punctuality of the whole service nationally. Against that, they set many years' decline in bus usage, increased prosperity, increasing car ownership, the increasing cost of bus travel and the falling cost of motoring. Clearly, the Government have recognised that the target that they set themselves was unattainable—it has been revised twice. We now have a target for not only buses but bus and light rail, increasing usage by 12 per cent. and growth in every region.

I listened with interest to the arguments of the hon. Members for Manchester, Blackley and for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell), who quickly dismissed the successes in some other areas, telling us, for instance, why Brighton's success was not applicable to Manchester. I visited the bus company in Brighton two Fridays ago. Just before we dismiss it so readily, let me quote from three paragraphs of a letter from Roger French, the managing director of Brighton and Hove's bus and coach company:

"The key ingredients that we have put into the partnership mixture are frequent services—80 per cent. of our passenger journeys are taken on a bus"

that runs

"at least every 10 minutes; simple pricing offering value for money; continued, sustained investment in new buses taking advantage of constantly improving technology and comfort and a passion for excellent customer service . . . The Local Authority's ingredients are the installation of effective bus priority measures on the road; a robust parking management and enforcement regime; effective enforcement of traffic regulations associated with bus priority measures . . . accessible bus stops which are pleasant to wait at with real time information . . . As we discussed the private sector is best placed to deal with the first 5 ingredients . . . and . . . local authorities are best placed to deal with the second 5 ingredients."

One of the problems in the deregulated market in parts of the country other than London is that bus companies are becoming increasingly frustrated at what they see as the failings of the local authorities, and local authorities are frustrated at what they see as local bus companies failing to invest or to be responsive. As I listened to the arguments of the hon. Members for Manchester, Blackley and for Pudsey, I wondered whether, if they met Mr. French, they might think that a lot of what he said may appertain to their areas. I recognise the frustrations that occur. Although the operators have the freedom to decide when and where to run routes, they are banned from co-ordinating services with other operators. The local authorities can offer subsidised, non-commercial services, but there are restrictions on the deals and on what they can negotiate with regard to service levels.

There are many frustrations, but is that an argument for ditching the system, or for improving it? I wait to hear the Minister's response, but I expect that she will bear in mind what the Secretary of State said about buses in Edinburgh:

"the route is more extensive and imaginative now than when the local authority ran the service . . . So I would be wary of saying that we should go back to the pre-1986 situation."—[Official Report, 2 July 2003; Vol. 408, c. 404.]

I am listening to the arguments being advanced today on the advantages of the PTEs, but I am guided by a National Audit Office report published in December 2005, which found that the Government were highly unlikely to meet their revised targets. When one considers the NAO's rationale and the points that it makes, one wonders whether it is saying that we should abandon what is in place at the moment, or modify it.

The NAO touched on better use of concessionary fares. That subject has already been mentioned this morning. As a result of the Government's initiative, at random, I phoned 25 local authorities around the country. None of them told me that the proportion of the money that was being provided under the new national scheme would cover the scheme in its area. I wonder how many authorities the Government have contacted; how the Government can say that the £350 million that they are going to provide will cover the bus concessionary scheme; how many of those authorities are using a subsidy scheme, or a block payment; and how many people, who were able to do so before, are now prevented from travelling across concessionary areas. What has been put in place will cause a levelling down rather than a levelling up of schemes.

The NAO report advised councils that they would do well to consider the way in which they procure services. Had I time, I would quote more extensively from the report, because it is useful to bear that in mind. It says that "the administration costs of procuring bus services are not high. But . . . if authorities currently tendering for individual routes or small packages of routes adopted a more strategic approach . . . they could achieve average savings equivalent to . . . some £26 million."

I wonder whether, in the context of improving the system, the Minister will talk about the ability of local authorities to relax the rules to allow scope for greater co-operation across PTEs and concessionary areas. That might make for some efficiency of provision. She will be aware that the NAO report was extremely critical of the Government in certain respects, including their failure to consider the transport plans that had been drawn up, the increase in usage and the need for proper monitoring of provisions that were being put in place. Will she comment on that?

I am a London MP, and I have heard much today about the paragon of virtue that is London. Those of us who live in London do not necessarily recognise those virtues. Bus usage is up, but fares are also up by 35 per cent. and that figure hides the cost of the concessionary scheme that Mr. Livingstone has put in place. Those of us who are local councillors as well as Members of Parliament have noticed that every year we are told how much we have to provide for the extra concessionary scheme, and that that usually comes off our social services budgets. That damages our ability to care for people at risk.

Mention has been made of Oyster cards. Some of the pricing irregularities are worth noting. London has done away, for no good reason, with the family railcard, so it now costs a family of my constituents, two adults and two children, travelling one stop from Wimbledon Park to Wimbledon something like £9.10 rather than the £3.40 that it cost them less than three months ago.

It is also true that our bus services are the most expensive per mile in the UK. Like all other hon. Members, I can quote the routes about whose failings my constituents regularly write to me. Route 200 springs to mind—it is criticised for poor delivery and poor punctuality and because "it never turns up". A consultation exercise decisively rejected the number 493, but it was imposed on us. It causes traffic chaos through one of my wards every day and I get at least one letter about it every week.

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Stephen Hammond: I have a minute left, so I am sorry but I will not.

The paragon of virtue that London has been described as must be carefully considered before we go too far in saying that everything in London is wonderful and everything elsewhere in the world is not. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley said that quality bus corridors would not necessarily ensure greater reliability or quality, but that does not square with the briefing from the transport authority, which states that journey times on completed quality bus corridors are now 10 times faster in peak areas. I would have wished to go into that in more depth, but I note that my time is running out.

Turning the clock back to the pre-1984 era is not the answer. The answer is to make the current system work and to improve it, and I look forward to the Minister's remarks about how the Government intend to address that.

10.51 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I begin by thanking all hon. Members for their kind words on this my penultimate day as a Minister. I should resign more often. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer) on securing this debate and on initiating a useful set of contributions. I listened to what everyone said with a great deal of interest. I hope that it will be of some reassurance that I do not intend to try to make the case that everything is for the best in this the best of all possible worlds. The Department recognises that there is a case for change, and I shall outline some of the changes that can be made.

I wish to respond to some specific points, particularly those of my hon. Friend. I assure him that this is not the only opportunity that we have had to hear the concerns of passenger transport executive areas. There is regular official dialogue with PTEs and Ministers—in fact, last week I met bus partnership forum representatives of the authorities as well as the operators—and meetings take place every couple of months at both the departmental and Government office level. I assure him that we do pick up on these arguments. I am aware from those activities and from the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell), for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) and for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) that there is real strength of feeling about these issues and that there are genuine concerns that we need to address.

We all agree on the importance of the bus as a key strand of public transport policy. Buses provide about two thirds of all public transport journeys—4 billion journeys in England, with about one quarter in PTE areas. They play, and will increasingly play, a vital role in tackling congestion and promoting accessibility and social exclusion.

Outside London, bus deregulation has been with us for some 20 years. Those years have not been easy for buses because of the growth in car ownership as well as the factors that hon. Members set out today, in particular the increasing cost base, which is a reality for whoever provides bus services on whatever basis. We must respond to the genuine and almost historically inevitable relationship between economic growth and rising car ownership.

It is fair to point out that deregulation has brought some benefits as well. It is important to keep some balance in the debate. There has been considerable investment over the years in new and better quality buses that has not been borne by the public purse. The average age of local buses has fallen to 7.2 years, which is comfortably below the target set by the industry earlier in this decade.

Mr. Leech: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Buck: Once only and very briefly, because of the time.

Mr. Leech: I accept that new buses have been constructed, but they tend to be put on the most profitable routes. All the old dodgy buses are left on routes that struggle to get passengers, creating a situation in which people are discouraged from using those less profitable routes.

Ms Buck: I understand that. It is part of the argument that hon. Members have been making. However, we must recognise that investment has been made that is not from the public purse. That provides opportunities for us to invest elsewhere.

One of the central points that hon. Members made was about the comparison with London. I appreciate and understand, not least as a London MP, that conurbations outside London look enviously at the patronage growth in London under the franchise system. I disagree with the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond): as a London MP and the proud holder of an Oyster card that I use regularly, I believe that due credit should be given to Transport for London and the Mayor for the governance, supported by Government money, that has brought about the increase in bus patronage.

It is not true that it would be possible to duplicate the London experience elsewhere. There are several reasons for that: the demographics, population density and size of London; the limited availability of workplace parking; the historic use of the rail and tube networks, which are part of the general public transport system; and the brave decision to introduce the world's first major congestion charging scheme, which has been part and parcel of the measures to increase bus patronage by increasing bus speeds in central London. All those factors together mean that car ownership in London is far lower than the national average: 36 per cent. of London households have no car, compared with 25 per cent. across England as a whole, and only 20 per cent. have two or more cars, compared with 31 per cent. nationally.

Furthermore, although it is true that there is generous Government support for London transport—rightly so, as it is the capital city—about half of the £2.8 billion per year investment in public transport comes from other sources such as the congestion charge and the council tax payer.

Hon. Members' comments reflected the fact that experience elsewhere shows that growth can be achieved outside London, particularly if local authorities and bus operators enjoy good relations. I shall not run through the list again because of the risk of irritating hon. Members, but it is not just in historic towns—Brighton and York among others—that we have achieved considerable success. Nottingham is also a good example. Last summer, I visited my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge, who is not in his place, and observed what was then the fastest growing bus route in the whole of England, and the guided bus way in Tyne and Wear, which is a spectacular success and shows what can be done when the challenge of providing new buses and responding to issues around bus reliability is met.

Time precludes my running through many of the issues, but let me say a little about bus priority measures. It is absolutely the case that any investment that is made in bus services must be considered in the context of improving bus priority to ensure that speed and reliability are enhanced. All the bus operators tell us that that is one of the key factors that attracts people to using bus services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley mentioned quality bus corridors. I believe that they are a good way of improving traffic flow for buses. They can bring in more custom and allow operators to increase frequency and to invest in new buses. That in turn can improve custom on other routes, and address some of the concerns that hon. Members have about radial routes operating to the exclusion of other services. In fact, measures that increase bus use dramatically on some priority routes can be a way of improving the service overall. Operators can use profits to cross-subsidise other marginal services, thus creating a virtuous circle of improved bus services.

There are many successful quality bus corridors in the PTE areas, and they are often underpinned by quality bus partnership agreements, under which the operator undertakes to provide a higher standard of service. Though voluntary, such agreements have proved to be an excellent channel for improving bus services across the area. We monitor the effectiveness of quality bus corridors through the local transport plan policy and do not rely on inspired guesswork.

There has not been much use of the statutory quality partnership power in the Transport Act 2000. That is partly because, where there are effective voluntary agreements, local authorities have not seen the need to use that power, but we encourage its use—

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next subject for debate.

Genetic Discrimination

11 am

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I am delighted to be here this morning, Mr. Jones. On Second Reading of the Disability Discrimination Bill on 23 March 2005, I said that the Government would at some time in the future have to consider passing legislation making it illegal to discriminate on the grounds of genetics. Although I congratulate them on outlawing most areas of discrimination faced by disabled people, there is still a large hole in the process of ensuring that disabled people have their full civil rights. We must make sure that they do not suffer disproportionately from genetic discrimination in their employment opportunities or in access to services such as insurance.

I see the issue as one of equality and civil rights. Unfortunately, not everyone does, and I was reminded of that when preparing for this debate. When we were fighting for full civil rights for disabled people, it was difficult to get a relevant Minister to answer because the issue was invariably seen as one of health. One of the first problems the disabled movement had in fighting for civil rights was to get disability away from the Department of Health so that we could begin to challenge the medical model of disability and make the Government realise that it was our civil rights we were fighting for, not just access to health treatment and social care.

When I was granted this debate, I suppose it should not really have come as a surprise that my request was passed to the Department of Health, despite the fact that the Table Office suggested that I should add "in employment" to the title, so that it would be clear that it concerned genetic testing and discrimination in employment, not just genetics, which obviously is a health issue. I had hoped that a Minister from the Department for Work and Pensions would be asked to reply, or the Minister from the Department of Trade and Industry who is responsible for workers' rights. I am glad that, not I, but the system in this place persuaded the relevant Minister to respond today. I suspect that the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Meg Munn) has drawn the short straw, but I am glad to see her. Her responsibilities include equality, and I believe that this is an equality issue.

The subject of genetic discrimination first came to my attention when I realised that those with diagnosed genetic conditions were receiving unfair treatment when applying for insurance. The insurance companies assumed that someone who had a genetic condition would automatically have a shorter life and should, therefore, pay higher premiums for any kind of life cover. That was also true for getting travel insurance, and several people contacted me, concerned either that it was impossible to get travel insurance for someone with a disability or that the premiums were so high that travel was almost impossible.

The assumptions often made by insurance companies regarding people with genetic conditions are that their lives will be shorter and that the quality of their lives will be less. That may be true of some conditions. For instance, if someone has been tested for Huntington's disease, there will be a direct correlation between their having the defective gene and the development of the disease later in life. However, it is impossible to predict when that might be or the severity with which the disease will initially hit, so there is a question of time scales. The situation with regard to the Huntington's gene is not necessarily the case for all genetic conditions. Indeed, a genetic disposition for a particular condition such as cancer or heart disease does not necessarily mean that an individual will develop the condition. A predisposition is purely that: a predisposition, not necessarily a matter of fact.

I know that insurance companies work on risk factors when they are working out the premiums payable, whether for life insurance or travel insurance, so they have to build in those risk factors and have access to all relevant information when making their decisions. I was very pleased when the Association of British Insurers announced in 2001 that it was to adopt a five-year moratorium on the use of genetic test results by insurers. At that time, I was about to apply for an Adjournment debate on the subject, but when the moratorium came along I decided to see how it worked, so I did not. If the moratorium did not work, I always intended to call for legislation to outlaw the practice of genetic discrimination.

I was particularly pleased to learn that from yesterday—I did not know this when I applied for the debate—a concordat has been agreed between the insurance industry and the Government, providing that insurers' use of genetic information should be transparent, fair and subject to independent oversight, and that the voluntary moratorium on insurers' use of predictive genetic tests should be extended until 1 November 2011. It has also been agreed that the concordat will be reviewed in 2008.

I know that not everyone is happy with everything the insurance industry has done because there are exemptions, such as Huntington's disease, but at least the system is much fairer. I certainly do not have any anecdotal evidence that people with genetic conditions feel they have been unfairly treated by the insurance industry. I believe that a model exists in that the insurance industry has shown the way. It is possible to ensure that those with genetic conditions are not treated unfairly and that there are clear guidelines, particularly for the use of predictive genetic tests.

The basis of my argument is that I would like a similar understanding to be reached with employers in the United Kingdom so that they do not demand the disclosure of genetic tests by their employees or, indeed, force employees or applicants for jobs to take the tests at all. If it is not possible to reach such an understanding and it becomes clear that genetic discrimination is taking place in the UK, I would look to the Government to legislate to outlaw that practice.

At this point, I should explain what is meant by predictive genetic tests and why it is important that people should be able to take such tests without the fear that it may lead to their being discriminated against. There are two main types of genetic tests. The first test a person's genetic make-up in order to identify, for example, where there may be faults in genes, or whether there are genes that would lead to a particular disease. The second type test for genetic damage that occurs during a person's lifetime.

I speak as a supporter of genetic testing. I was born with a genetic condition and know the good that such tests can do. They play important roles in diagnosis and in treatment. For some, they may diagnose something for which there are presently no symptoms, but where it is useful to know that the genetic condition exists, as it may help determine lifestyle choices or help in early detection so that remedial treatment can prevent the symptoms from occurring. It is an important health issue.

It is for precisely those reasons that I want to ensure that people who may have genetic conditions feel safe in having a test, secure in the knowledge that the information gained will not be used by anyone to discriminate against them in future. Only with such assurances will people feel at ease in taking a test that may be very important to their future health. Evidence from elsewhere in the world, particularly the United States, which seems the worst example of a country in which people are forced to disclose information gained through genetic tests—suggests that without assurances that the information will not be used against them, people shy away from having the tests done at all. That has important consequences for their future health plans. I ask the Government to ensure that security measures are in place so that people can take genetic tests in the sure knowledge that the tests will be used for good of the individual and not to discriminate against them.

In years to come, genetic testing will become more sophisticated, and I want to ensure that such tests are a force for good, that they lead to better diagnoses and treatment and that they are not something to be feared. Of course, someone who has symptoms and a disability as a result of a genetic disease is likely to be covered by existing disability discrimination legislation. Someone who is asymptomatic is not covered, and nor is someone who might be affected by a condition later in life. Nor, indeed, is someone who has undergone a predictive genetic test, because it predicts only a propensity, and not that they will get the disease.

Many people fear predictive genetic tests. For someone who has a family history of breast cancer, it may be right to have a predictive test, but if there are no guidelines and no security against the test's being used to discriminate against the individual, they may not undertake it.

Predictive genetic tests are still crude, and their development has a long way to go, but even today, they are used to predict someone's propensity for developing a particular condition—perhaps cancer or heart disease. Although such tests may predict a propensity or susceptibility towards a condition, they predict neither that the person will definitely develop that condition, nor any time scales if they should. Therefore, if predictive genetic tests were used by insurance companies or employers to determine that an individual should be treated less favourably than someone else, that would be discrimination, and such practice should be outlawed. The use of those types of tests is causing most concern among organisations such as the Trades Union Congress and GeneWatch.

At a time when the Government are trying to encourage more disabled people into the work force, or to keep those who have developed a disability while in a job, it would be perverse if employers were able to use genetic tests as a recruitment tool to screen out people who were thought to be a greater risk.

The Human Genetics Commission has found no evidence that employers in the UK are systematically using genetic test results to recruit people, or using such tests as part of workplace health programmes—yet. However, the HGC has outlined the following general principles:

"that everyone is entitled to privacy and should not have to discuss information about personal genetic characteristics; that private genetic information should not be obtained or held without a person's consent; that private personal genetic information should be treated as confidential and not communicated to others without a person's consent; and that no one should be unfairly discriminated against on the basis of his or her genetic characteristics."

A number of countries, such as Austria, Denmark, France, the Netherlands and Norway, have some form of legislation that prohibits or limits employers' rights to ask for genetic information. Before it becomes a serious problem, it may be time for the UK Government to look to follow suit.

It is clear that genetic testing will increase. I want to ensure that those tests are used for good reasons and not to discriminate against an individual. We must ensure that they are used positively, whether it is to help in diagnosis and cure, to help people make more rational life choices, or to help employers ensure that they provide a safe working environment. They should not be used to help employers find an easy way to save money by not employing certain types of people because they may be a higher risk to the employer later in life or incur extra expenses for the employer.

It is time for the Government to consider the issue seriously to encourage employers to follow the lead given by the insurance companies and consider a moratorium on the use of the tests. Ultimately, however, there will probably come a time when the Government have to legislate to outlaw genetic discrimination in the UK.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) on securing the debate, and I pay tribute to the great deal of work that she has done on many occasions to raise disability and genetics issues. I am also grateful to her for the opportunity to debate this issue and to lay out the steps that the Government are taking.

My hon. Friend suggested that I had drawn the short straw, but I am happy to address the issue, because, as she said, my responsibilities cover women and equality. As I have said on many occasions, particularly during the passage of the Equality Bill, which is the legislation that will set up the new commission for equality and human rights, equality affects everybody and should be a concern of everybody. I am delighted that my hon. Friend has raised an issue that is not often referred to but about which we should nevertheless be concerned.

In the 2003 White Paper on genetics, we said that the Government "wholeheartedly endorses" the Human Genetics Commission's view that no one should be unfairly discriminated against on the basis of their genetic characteristics. The White Paper reminds us that universal health care, funded from taxation, which is the basis of the national health service, protects people against discrimination on the basis of genetic information. As genetic testing becomes more widely available, we are concerned to ensure that people should not and will not have to fear losing cover for health care.

All people with a genetic condition will be protected by the Disability Discrimination Act 2005, once their condition results in their becoming a disabled person within the meaning of that Act. My hon. Friend referred to that issue. However, we must not be complacent about the risk to people who, as a result of genetic testing, are shown to have an increased risk or, in limited cases, the certainty of developing a particular condition later in life.

The Government have done much to promote equality and tackle discrimination—a great deal more than any previous Government in our country. We have offered many people protection under the law for the first time, we are taking action to streamline and modernise the framework of discrimination law, and we are considering areas, such as the one under discussion, in which there are calls for specific new legal protection.

The Government have outlawed discrimination in the workplace on the grounds of sexual orientation and religion and belief, and we plan to do so later this year for age. In 2004, we significantly extended protection for disabled people against disability discrimination in recruitment and employment.

The Government have also brought in a groundbreaking duty on public authorities to promote race equality, eliminate racial discrimination and promote good relations between different racial groups. The legislation was introduced in 2002. As I am sure my hon. Friend knows, it is being followed by similar duties for disability and gender, which are due to come into force in December 2006 and April 2007 respectively. We legislated to provide legal recognition for same-sex partnerships for the first time through the Civil Partnership Act 2004.

The Equality Act 2006 has made significant steps, and it received Royal Assent on 16 February. It has three main purposes. First, it establishes the commission for equality and human rights, whose general duties, set out in statute, include encouraging the development of a society in which people's ability to achieve their potential is not limited by prejudice or discrimination. Secondly, it makes discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief unlawful in the provision of goods, facilities and services, and in the exercise of public functions. Thirdly, it creates a duty on public authorities to promote equality of opportunity between men and women, and to prohibit sex discrimination in the exercise of public functions. It also includes a power to make secondary legislation outlawing discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation in the provision of goods, facilities and services. We are currently consulting on the detail of those measures. However, although there are many provisions relating to many areas of discrimination, we recognise that there is still more to do if we are to ensure that everyone's skills and talents can be fully realised and that people are not discriminated against for any reason, such as in the ways that my hon. Friend has described.

The Government are currently undertaking a discrimination law review that is working to develop a clearer and more streamlined framework of equality law. It will lead to a single equality Act later in this Parliament; that is a manifesto commitment. As part of the review, we are, of course, considering the calls made by various people from various organisations to extend discrimination law into new areas, including genetic predisposition. Genetic tests are becoming available that show that a person has an increased risk or a likelihood—or, in some cases, certainty—of developing a particular medical condition later in life. As my hon. Friend said, the concern is that the results of such tests might be used by employers to screen out applicants for jobs or promotion, or that insurance companies might screen out applicants for health cover or life insurance, or increase their premiums unreasonably.

I understand the concerns, but the technology is at an early stage, and it is important that nothing is done except on the basis of careful consideration of all the options. Discrimination law is one possibility, but there are clearly others, including legislation about the use of genetic tests, or statutory guidance. I intend to publish a Green Paper this summer, which will set out initial proposals and options for clarifying and streamlining discrimination law, and which will seek the views of all interested parties. We are committed to taking on board the views of all interested people, and we do not want to predict or pre-empt the findings of that consultation. I invite my hon. Friend and all who are concerned about this issue—I know that other Members involved in all-party groups have discussed it at length—to respond.

The work of the discrimination law review will run alongside the independent equalities review, which the Government established to investigate the causes of persistent discrimination and inequality in British society. The findings of the equalities review, which is due to report to the Prime Minister later in the year, will inform the work of the discrimination law review and the subsequent single equality Bill—and, indeed, the work of the new commission for equality and human rights. Let me reassure my hon. Friend that any proposals for reform to equality legislation will take full account both of the need to tackle inequality effectively and of the need to follow better regulation principles to minimise the burden on business and public services.

I will now address the specific concerns that my hon. Friend raised. First, on employment, the Government are not aware of there being any evidence at present of large-scale use of genetic testing by employers. However, we are committed to monitoring developments in genetic testing and have asked the Human Genetics Commission to assess the prevalence of genetic testing in the workplace and to report back later this spring. Given the weather, I am not sure whether we are quite into spring yet, or how soon it will come, but we will get that report in the near future. The HGC is well placed to undertake the work as it has an excellent understanding of the issues, is well respected and—importantly—will provide independent advice. In addition, the Information Commissioner's statutory employment code sets out that employers should inform the HGC of any proposals to use genetic testing for employment purposes. The Government have included questions on genetic testing in the 2005 British social attitudes survey to assess public opinion on the issue. The results will be available later this year.

The Government wish to ensure that once genetic testing has advanced to the stage where the use of test results by employers becomes a realistic proposition there are appropriate safeguards to prevent such information from being unfairly used. The Data Protection Act 1998 does not prevent the use of genetic testing, but as this is sensitive information about individuals' health, it is subject to restrictive rules. This demonstrates our commitment to monitoring the use of genetic testing in employment, with a view to ensuring that we will ensure safeguards are in place once genetic testing has reached an advanced stage. My hon. Friend referred to evidence that it is used much more widely in the United States, and she was concerned about whether it would become more of an issue in our country. We will have to keep a close eye on that. However, in the United States much health insurance and much provision of health services are linked to employment, which is one reason why I believe the issue is much greater there than it is likely to be in our country.

On insurance, as my hon. Friend said, we have a ban until November 2011 on the use by insurers of results from predictive genetic tests, unless a test has been approved by the Government's Genetics and Insurance Committee and relates to a policy over the substantial financial limits of £500,000 for life insurance, £300,000 for critical illness insurance, or £30,000 a year for income protection insurance. The insurance industry recently made it clear that it will not ask for approval to use the results from predictive genetic tests in determining insurance premiums before 2008. The Association of British Insurers wrote to the Department of Health on 15 February 2006 to say that insurers will not apply to use any predictive genetic test result in determining insurance premiums before 2008. The only test that they may currently use—they can do so until 2011—is for Huntington's disease for life insurance policies of more than £500,000. The current agreement with the insurance industry is flexible enough to respond to fast-moving technological and clinical developments in genetic testing. The Government have made it clear that any failure in respect of the agreement will lead to reconsideration of the need for statutory control. The Government stand by the commitment in the 2003 White Paper on genetics that any failure of the agreement will lead to reconsideration of the need for statutory control. If there is evidence of non-compliance with the moratorium by the insurance industry, the Government are prepared to enforce it through legislation. However, there is no such evidence at present.

In conclusion, I repeat that the Government are committed to a society in which no one is unfairly discriminated against on the basis of his or her genetic characteristics. The discrimination law review will look into calls for specific legal protections to be introduced in the area of genetic predisposition and other new areas. I cannot predict the outcome of the review, but I look forward to there being a full and productive examination of the issues.

Broadband (Rural Areas)

2.30 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Jones. It is also a pleasure, for which I am grateful, to have the opportunity to introduce this debate on broadband in rural areas.

On 8 March last year the Minister with us today—then the Minister for Rural Affairs—and the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce wrote a letter to all parish and town councils, headed "Partnership in rolling out broadband to rural communities". The letter said, rightly, that broadband can reduce dependence on big population centres and increase investment, employment opportunities and choice without undermining the character of rural Britain.

"Broadband Britain is becoming a reality" it said, and it urged parish and town councils to communicate the benefits of broadband to the communities that they serve.

The letter was greeted with raised eyebrows by a group of constituents who live in the Hambleden valley area, most of which is within my constituency. I shall not waste words describing the area, other than to say that it is rural and beautiful, and that despite its prosperity it contains pockets of exclusion and isolation. Like other rural areas it is, of course, going through a process of change.

The group was aware that almost 300 households and almost 60 businesses in the area cannot get broadband, so the Ministers' letter would in that sense have been rather wasted. Hambleden Valley Ltd was formed by the group in 2003 to obtain broadband services for the whole area. The company was intended as a procurement vehicle and was set up to meet the South East England Development Agency's requirements for broadband service procurement. Its website address, which is of course available both to those who have broadband and those who unfortunately do not, is www.hambledenvalley.net.

Hambleden Valley Ltd. wrote to SEEDA to ask for assistance in February last year. By August, no response had been forthcoming. Today, there has been no formal response, apart from a phone conversation, which I am told did not address longer-term issues and limitations associated with using anything other than landlines. In October, the group came to see me to discuss the difficulties that some of my constituents were having in getting access to broadband. It soon became evident to me that the local difficulty had a national dimension.

I was told, and British Telecom has confirmed, that 0.2 per cent. of all telephone lines in the country cannot get broadband, but that may not be a definitive figure. Hambleden Valley Ltd referred me to a study in Kent, which the Minister may have seen, and which was carried out by Kent county council. The figure that it produced for such lines was not 0.2 per cent. In fact 2.4 per cent. of businesses and 2.2 per cent. of households in the county could not get broadband, so the figure in rural areas is likely to be higher.

I should explain to those hon. Members who have difficulty in following the technical details—I must confess that I am one of them—that areas that cannot get broadband coverage are sometimes referred to as

[Mr. Paul Goodman]

"not spots", as opposed, I presume, to "hot spots". I was intrigued by this matter, so I asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in a written question whether he would list each constituency that contains a proportion of the relevant 0.2 per cent. of lines. The answer was that the information was not available in the form requested. I decided to drop the request for constituency information and ask the Secretary of State in another written question where the lines were located. The answer was that the information was not available in the form requested.

At that point I gave up trying to second-guess the form in which the information might be available and decided instead to do a little investigation on a non-party political basis. I duly discovered that approximately 15 parliamentary colleagues reported their constituents to be in the same situation as mine. Since not all parliamentary colleagues from across the House will necessarily respond to inquiries from me, it must be assumed that the definitive figure is higher.

I had clearly stumbled across a national problem, which is why I balloted for this debate, which I am grateful to have obtained. In the time remaining to me I want to discuss possible solutions to the problem, to describe what appear to be present obstacles to those solutions, and to ask the Minister a few questions, which I hope he will be able to deal with.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is a dispersed national issue to be dealt with. I look forward to responding to the debate. Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the 0.2 per cent. of lines to which he referred—or even 2 per cent., if that is the correct figure—for which there are obstacles is a small proportion, given that only a couple of years ago we thought large swathes of rural Britain would not have access to broadband, yet now they do?

Mr. Goodman: The Minister anticipates a complimentary remark that I was going to make later about BT. He evidently thought that I might not get there. I cannot, of course, be definitive about the figures and say whether the percentage is 0.2 per cent., 2.0 per cent. or 2.4 per cent. The Minister is more likely than I am to have access to the figures. I want now to discuss possible solutions and present obstacles to them, before asking the Minister a few questions.

Broadband services are provided by one of three means: through satellite or wireless means, by cable operators using the cable TV network, or by BT and others over BT's phone lines. Hambleden Valley Ltd claims that the problems facing the valley are typical of unserved areas as a whole. It says that satellite broadband will not support new uses of the internet, including cheap video and teleconferencing, telephony and video games, and that in intensely wooded areas such as the valley, where mobile phone reception is poor, the installation of the necessary infrastructure may be neither practical nor effective. The question of cost also arises.

Hambleden Valley Ltd also says that cable companies, as competitive and profit-conscious operators, are unlikely to try to expand their coverage in rural areas because of the potential expense and lack of return. Hambleden Valley Ltd maintains that ultimately a solution from BT is needed—that, indeed, a solution can come only from BT. The argument falls into two parts, one of which is practical and one moral.

The practical argument is that in the area in question, and elsewhere, BT is technically capable of installing a fibre-optic cable, which in this case would run from the Henley exchange to local distribution points, where equipment would be installed in roadside cabinets. That equipment, in turn, would be able to distribute the broadband service to individual homes and businesses in the area.

The moral argument, if that is the right word, is that no near-monopoly supplier of electricity would readily ignore the need for electricity of 0.2 per cent. of homes and businesses, and that no near-monopoly supplier of water would readily ignore their need for water, just because they were in remote locations. As for electricity and water, the argument runs, so should it be for phones, and therefore for broadband..

Perhaps BT itself is a witness for that point of view. In the brief prepared for the debate BT states:

"BT's ultimate goal is to make broadband available to anyone who wants it but, clearly, this has to be commercially viable."

There is the rub, and there are the obstacles to possible solutions.

I am coming to the part of my remarks that the Minister did not think I would make. Hambleden Valley Ltd. acknowledges that BT has done a good job in rolling out broadband, and that the British record compares well to that of other countries. It acknowledges that it is the very success of the British record that puts the minority of people and businesses without broadband at a significant disadvantage. This is an appearance of an old friend, which used to be cited by Peter Walker when he was active in politics, which is the problem of success. If one has success, it leaves the area or the people not covered by that success at a disadvantage that they feel acutely. BT suggested in its brief for this debate that workable solutions for the 2 per cent. or so of lines in rural areas that cannot get broadband do not yet exist. My constituents argue that BT has not yet proved that case, as it has not disclosed what the cost would be, and would obviously be unwilling to do so.

Furthermore, there is controversy about subsidising loss-making lines. In effect, BT argues that it would be breaching EU competition rules if it subsidised non-profitable broadband services in some rural areas by means of its profitable operations in others. Again, a key question is what BT's costs would be.

Last month, my hon. Friends the Members for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), and for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones)—both of whom are present—and for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Henley (Mr. Johnson) and I wrote jointly seeking a round-table discussion with Openreach, the service arm of BT, that delivers broadband, and Ofcom, at which those issues might be explored. Openreach was happy to have such a round-table meeting; Ofcom suggested that we first meet Openreach to discuss the technology side of the issue, and then meet Ofcom.

I concede at once that I am not an expert on the technology side, but the vital problem for those in rural areas, whether in my constituency or elsewhere, is not technological. That is, the problem is not their elected representative's grasp, or lack of grasp, of technology. It is political; it is the difficulty of getting all the parties concerned around one table, and of getting the necessary political impetus.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on raising this important issue. In the provision of all utility services, is there not a distinction between the infrastructure—the lines between the customer and the provider—and the supplier of a particular function? Surely a difference should be made between laying the fibre-optic cable—the broadband cable, as it were—and the provider of the service, who allows use of that line. If the Government were to emphasise the importance of infrastructure, they might be able to persuade BT to get around the problem.

Mr. Goodman: When the Minister replies, I expect that he will emphasise the importance of infrastructure. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) is right to distinguish between what my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West, refers to as the platform—that is, the platform on which BT provides the service—and the lines that might take the services to isolated people and relatively isolated businesses.

I want to ask the Minister five questions. First, to pursue the issue that I tried to explore in my written questions, what analysis has the Minister's Department made of where the 0.2 per cent. of lines that cannot get broadband are concentrated? Perhaps that form of words will help; we shall see. Secondly, what part, if any, does he think he can play in getting the main players around one table?

Thirdly, what analysis has he made of the role that public bodies, such as his Department, regional development agencies and local authorities, play in supporting publicly funded broadband projects in rural areas, as opposed to non-rural areas? It has been put to me that some RDAs are proving more effective than others. To cite a good example rather than a bad one, I was told that Advantage West Midlands is doing especially well. I ask because there is a perception that in urban areas private-sector providers—new entrepreneurs—are jostling for space with publicly funded broadband projects. Hambleden Valley Ltd cites as a recent example a project in Milton Keynes using infrastructure from Pipex. The point is that urban areas are getting the new entrepreneurs and the public money; there is a risk that rural areas will not get the entrepreneurs, as they cannot yet make a profit there, or the exploratory funds from public bodies that might enable those rural areas to get a better service.

Fourthly, what part can the Minister play in galvanising his Department, RDAs and local authorities into assisting publicly funded broadband projects in rural areas? My fifth question struck me when I was reading Countryside Alliance's brief for this debate: is it correct to assert that only 3 per cent. of rural businesses connect to the internet via broadband? I wondered whether that figure related to those who cannot get broadband, or to those who have access to it but simply do not use it.

I want to step back from the detail and look at the big picture. People in rural areas, especially farmers, are rightly being asked to diversify. Diversification often means business, and business means being e-enabled, to use a jargon word. Being e-enabled surely means getting broadband sooner or later. About 50 businesses in my constituency are affected; that is a lot of businesses. The concern of my constituents is that when, in due course, BT or others roll out super-broadband elsewhere, they will still not even have broadband. This is in a country where, according to Hambleden Valley Ltd, one has to apply for public-service work by e-mail, and in a world that, as we all acknowledge, is moving ever faster.

Parts of our rural areas are already isolated and socially excluded in many ways, including through transport, lack of access to health, social services and employment, and lack of access to what this Government, like the Conservative Government that preceded them, describe as opportunity for all. None of us wants to add lack of access to technology to that list. We look to the Minister to point to a way forward.

2.46 pm

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing time to discuss the matter. He outlined the problems in his usual incisive and succinct way.

In the 10 short months in which I have been a Member, I have received numerous e-mails, phone calls and letters from constituents who have had disappointing and frustrating experiences when trying to access broadband internet in Pembrokeshire. In those 10 months, I have built up a considerable file of cases, which I have been working on with BT. Some concern families or elderly couples. Several small businesses have contacted me, saying that they rely on e-mail and web access to be viable in such a remote, peripheral part of the United Kingdom.

For example, on 14 February I received a rather sad e-mail from a local business man, entitled "Pulling out of Wales". One reason that he cited for quitting the Principality was the fact that his wife's start-up venture—an advanced post-production centre for TV and films—was simply not viable at their home location, because they have been told that they simply cannot get broadband.

I shall not go into too much detail about the cases that I am working on, but a typical scenario is that someone interested in accessing broadband, logs on to BT's website, or that of another internet service provider, and taps in their postcode. They are informed that their local exchange is enabled, and that they can receive broadband. They place an order for the broadband kit, but an engineer comes round later to test the line and tells the customer that they cannot receive broadband after all. It is left to the customer to try to claim a refund on the order and, understandably, they are left feeling rather unhappy. That experience, in which the customer is initially under the impression that they can receive broadband and places an order on that understanding, is leaving a bitter taste in the mouths of many of my constituents.

Another local business man wrote me a letter, which I received last May. He said that a large part of his business is net-based. He says:

"Broadband is integral to the success of my business".

[Mr. Stephen Crabb]

He goes on to outline his difficulties in trying to access broadband with a particular internet service provider. He says:

> "If they could not supply broadband then they should have told me so when I first applied and given me their reasons . . . Instead all I get is a fog of misinformation".

Despite all the attention devoted to local exchange enabling, my constituents have not appreciated that, at the end of the day, it is not a question of whether the local exchange is enabled; it is the quality of the line from the exchange to the household that counts, and that line quality is not good enough.

I am told that in Pembrokeshire some problems with broadband availability are due to the amount of aluminium wiring used. Apparently, it is not suitable for carrying digital information in the way that copper wiring is. Another reason that I have been given is the distance between a house and the local exchange. However, we have had a scenario where some villagers in a small village can get broadband but their immediate neighbours cannot, so even that reason has been questioned by some of my constituents. In not one of the cases with which I have dealt in the past year has local exchange enabling been the central issue.

One major cause of frustration and disappointment is that my constituents have heard the public relations line from BT about 99.8 per cent. of households being able to receive broadband, which they believe is now nearly universally available. However, the number of e-mails and letters that I have received in Pembrokeshire alone suggests that nothing like 99.8 per cent. of households can get broadband.

I suspect that the figure of 99.8 per cent. is a rather imprecise estimate based on averaging an estimated number of enabled exchanges across the total UK population. Getting a more definite figure has proved problematic. I have asked BT for an estimate of the number of households in my county or my constituency that cannot access broadband owing to technical constraints, but it has not been able to provide such a figure:

> "at present BT cannot accurately estimate the actual number of homes where it is not feasible to provide broadband access."

If BT cannot accurately estimate the number of homes that can access broadband, where on earth does the figure of 99.8 per cent. come from? BT states only that the "vast majority" of households in Pembrokeshire can access broadband.

A local telecoms engineer informed me that he believes that only around 40 per cent. of an exchange area in Pembrokeshire can receive good quality broadband, which includes any speeds down to about 256 kilobits—a very low figure indeed. I have also heard another engineer comment that BT's figure of 99 per cent. should probably be nearer 65 per cent. nationwide. Some clarification is required, and BT needs to be more careful about some of its public relations.

Judging from the interest in this afternoon's debate, I suspect that Pembrokeshire is not an isolated example. There are issues to do with broadband access in rural areas throughout the country.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has articulated very well the concerns of many households and small businesses. Does he share the frustration of the many charities that are affected? For instance, the Royal National Institute for Deaf People Cymru has run an excellent project called "Hear to help", which covers Ceredigion and Powys but has been severely hampered by its lack of access to broadband. RNID Cymru relies on access to the internet for shared drives among its volunteers but its work has been seriously hampered by the lack of progress on the issue.

Mr. Crabb: The hon. Gentleman makes an excellent point. He is a good champion for the charity and voluntary sector in Wales and has illustrated a key concern for that sector.

The Minister will be aware that BT has received substantial sums of public money in recent years to extend broadband availability throughout the UK. In November he informed me in an answer to a written question that since 1997 BT has received approximately £500,000 from the East of England Development Agency, nearly £1 million from the south-west regional development agency, £16.5 million in Scotland and £3.6 million of European structural funding in Wales, which does not include yesterday's announcement. In the north-east region, BT was paid £1.8 million and there have been other, more localised subsidies; for example, £360,000 was awarded to BT through a contract with the Cheshire digital development agency.

All that adds up to more than £23 million of public money that BT has received since 1997. Given the information that the Minister has available, does he think that the taxpayer has received value from those subsidies to BT?

Alun Michael: The expectation of cost at any earlier stage, before market-based responses started to deliver broadband, was far higher than the figures that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. Initiatives such as the "Act Now" project in Cornwall have demonstrated that once we get the provision of broadband a market develops and people start to respond and look for broadband outside the area of a direct project. There are an awful lot of lessons to be learned. The sums to which the hon. Gentleman referred assisted in building the broadband market over quite an extended period.

Mr. Crabb: I look forward to hearing more detail in the Minister's reply and learning what he thinks the money has bought this country that would not have been provided in the marketplace.

I have heard it said by a very senior BT executive that BT would like to "move on" from discussing broadband access in Wales to discussing what is called next generation technology. I am afraid that BT needs to be pulled back to the discussion about broadband access because, as I hope the evidence that I have provided in the last 10 minutes and the speeches that we shall hear in the remainder of this debate will show, the lack of broadband availability in a lot of rural areas is causing severe problems for businesses, households and charities.

Alun Michael: I would ask colleagues throughout the Chamber to be careful about one thing. Having spent four years as Minister for Rural Affairs, I know that talking down rural affairs does not help, although I do not think that that is the hon. Gentleman's intention. There are problems in some locations in some rural areas. That is not to say that there problems in all rural areas. If the impression is given that there are problems in all rural areas, the danger is that the rural economy will get talked down. Broadband is accessible and is being used effectively by many businesses in many rural areas throughout the country. The focus of today's debate is the small but important number of gaps in the infrastructure.

Mr. Crabb: I take the Minister's point on board. I do not think that it is the intention of any of the participants here to talk down their rural areas. During the short time in which I have been a Member of this place, I have come to recognise a number of the hon. Members present as champions for their rural constituencies.

Mr. Paul Goodman: Although the Minister is correct to urge those present not to run down rural areas, as he put it, is it not hard to be sure how many people and businesses in rural areas are not connected to broadband while we do not have a definitive figure? It is therefore hard to be sure of the scale of the problem, and we hope that the Minister can assist us in that respect.

Mr. Crabb: I finish by echoing my hon. Friend's point. Crucial to this debate is a better understanding of the number of households that cannot get access to broadband.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): Order. Four hon. Members wish to speak and we have about half an hour before the wind-ups. I hope that hon. Members can keep their speeches short in order to get everybody in.

2.58 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing this debate. Like others who wish to speak, I represent a rural area where broadband access is a problem, but we are not here to run down such areas—far from it.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), I have struggled to reconcile the claim of virtually universal coverage of access to broadband with the experience of many of my constituents. Like him, I have a raft of correspondence—he will be relieved to hear that I shall not detain the Chamber with it—with people who have difficulty gaining access to broadband. I am here to argue their cause.

That cause is not only my constituents' but the Government's, as the Minister has been at pains to tell us and as he will, I am sure, tell us again when he winds up. The Government's priority is to provide universal access to broadband, which is a noble and entirely honourable aspiration. As the Minister wrote to me in a letter on 24 January:

"Stimulating broadband availability across the whole of the UK is a Government priority. We want to see all communities, irrespective of location, having access to an affordable broadband service from a competitive market."

I should like to dwell on some of the issues raised by that aspiration.

The significance of broadband in Shropshire is enormous. Last year Shropshire was declared to have the highest proportion of home-working of anywhere in the country. Because of even more remote access to the services than one might normally find in a constituency such as Wycombe, my constituents have great distances to travel and few job opportunities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe said, internet access is the one thing that provides the farming community with an opportunity for diversification, and a large proportion of the working age population, plus many who are beyond working age but have not had such opportunities before, with a way in to work. It is of great significance.

Shropshire county council has recognised that, and I commend the work that it has done through Switch on Shropshire, an initiative that has been running for three years in conjunction with Advantage West Midlands to deliver broadband to communities. They have done well. I do not often congratulate my regional development agency in the House, but it has done a good job. Indeed it was highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe as being particularly successful in that regard. It has achieved that with relatively modest resources—some £4.9 million has been allocated to broadband, about half of which has been spent. A number of initiatives are being taken to bring broadband to communities that currently lack it.

Let me address some challenges of delivering broadband in my constituency. Some are technological, which means that I may stray into areas that are a little beyond my pay grade or competence. It seems that a significant problem arises from the use by BT of digital access carrier systems as the delivery mechanism for telephony. It is clear that DACS cannot be shared with broadband access. Therefore, there is a requirement on BT to replace such systems with a hard wire or wireless system that will allow high-speed broadband delivery. Most of my constituents' problems occur when they apply for broadband modems. They are signed up by their internet service providers or by BT Retail, which takes their money and installs modems but then discovers that BT Wholesale is not able to deliver the service because they are on DACS. The cost of replacing the DACS technology is a commercial decision, not one that the ISP is able to force BT to implement. BT has made that very clear. On 13 January it told me that

"whereas BT has a universal service obligation to provide telephony service, the provision of broadband is based on a commercial model."

There is nothing wrong with that, provided that the commercial model can deliver access to broadband. There is an inherent conflict if it is uncommercial for BT to deliver to a remote individual household because of the cost that would be involved in replacing the line. How does the Minister intend to square the circle of dealing with BT's commercial priorities and the Government's priority to deliver universal access?

The impact of lack of broadband is clear. I should like to use as an example one of my constituents who might be known to racing enthusiasts in the Chamber. He is the racehorse trainer, Henry Daly, who happens to be one of the largest employers on the outskirts of Ludlow, one of the main towns in my constituency. He employs some 65 people and, despite living within three or four miles of a relatively large exchange, does not have access to broadband and has been trying to get it for the past two years.

All entries and declarations for races are available on the internet, which means that Mr Daly is unable to compete with trainers up and down the country to secure nominations for his horses, because he gets access to that information after everybody else. As a result, his horses do not always get high enough up the list to be able to be entered in the races for which they are best suited. That is a small example, but I think that will strike a chord with those who have an interest in racing. There is a clear competitiveness issue for people who are trying to do business in the countryside. There are also issues for people who wish to undertake adult learning from home. Schools have been connected, but we also need domestic connections.

Finally, I should like to touch on some of the solutions being proposed, particularly by Advantage West Midlands, and to urge the Minister to find one that he favours. There is something called Rabit—the remote area broadband inclusion trial. I am not sure whether it is peculiar to Advantage West Midlands or a national solution. For businesses only, the regional development agency is funding grants to provide satellite delivery—up to the 512 kilobyte service—to qualifying businesses. For faster speeds, the grant has to be matched. In most cases, that means that a small business will have to find £1,000 to secure the speed necessary for a proper, interactive service.

I urge the Minister to tell us when he will extend a scheme such as Rabit to cover domestic premises, given the priority that he has given to enabling the entire country to have access to the service.

3.6 pm

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on having secured this important debate. I especially pleased to participate because, as you know, Mr. Jones, I come from a particularly rural area, and one that is known to the Minister as well.

I have not had the experience that my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) has had. Wales has been well served in terms of the extension of broadband—BT has worked hard with the Welsh Assembly. I was delighted to hear only this morning that the two telephone exchanges in my constituency that are not broadband enabled, Cyfylliog and Llannewydd, will be broadband enabled this year. The Assembly has done a good job in working with BT to extend broadband. I say that as a former member of the Assembly committee that pushed forward the broadband strategy for Wales.

However, my concern, which I think will be shared by many rural Members, is that the broadband that will be enabled in Wales will be first generation broadband. That is broadband at a far lower speed—from 512 kilobits per second to about 2 megabits per second—than will be available to the urban parts of the country that are being enabled with second generation broadband. That is the standard that is required if broadband is to have any meaningful application in the rural areas. Home Choice, a well known broadband television provider, has a minimum requirement of 4.3 megabits per second for TV drama, and as much as 5.6 megabits per second for sport, which will be well beyond the reach of those in rural areas.

The Minister may be able to comment on the matter, but it will be a considerable time before rural areas in Wales and elsewhere will be able to enjoy such speeds. Consequently, rural areas will be victims of the success that my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe mentioned. There will be a disparity between the quality of broadband enjoyed in urban areas and that in country areas; what might be called broadband poverty will be experienced in rural parts of the country.

Broadband is exciting; its potential is almost limitless. In fact, it is limited only by the imagination of those who seek to use it. However, without second generation access, people in rural areas will not be in a position to enjoy it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe touched on a further problem: urban areas that are enabled to a higher degree of broadband far earlier, as they will be, and have the critical mass that will attract broadband operators will reap those rewards at the expense of rural areas whose populations are far too sparse to attract the operators of the new technology, which will inevitably be built on the broadband platform.

None of us is talking down rural areas; quite the opposite, in fact. What we are doing—I think that all hon. Members present represent rural constituencies—is calling for the Minister and the Government to come up with some imaginative solutions that will ensure that rural areas enjoy the same quality and diversity of broadband that urban areas will shortly enjoy. I am concerned that if that is not done and we do not get second generation broadband sooner, and if something is not done to attract independent operators, rural areas will fall further behind.

Broadband could revolutionise life in the countryside: it could provide educational facilities; its use in medical diagnosis could be invaluable; and, of course, its entertainment possibilities are well known. I believe that people in rural areas should be able to enjoy those facilities just as people in urban areas do, and I hope that the Government will come forward with imaginative solutions that will ensure that people in rural areas can enjoy the same degree of broadband that those in urban areas will shortly enjoy.

3.11 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing the debate. Obviously, this is an important issue for a number of us who represent rural areas.

I shall start on an upbeat note, to please the Minister if I possibly can, by telling hon. Members that the Welsh Assembly announced today that, working with BT, it intends to invest nearly £100 million to ensure that the 35 exchanges in Wales not currently upgraded are upgraded in the near future. Nine of those exchanges—more than a quarter—are in my constituency. However, as the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) said, the simple fact that an exchange is upgraded does not necessarily mean that any number of the people served by it will benefit from broadband.

At the beginning of the IT revolution, the general opinion was that broadband would be a real advantage for rural areas, which could be part of the economic breakthrough, as businesses could be located in the deep countryside and bring strength to those communities. Instead, those areas are now even more disadvantaged than they were in the past. Not only have they had difficulty in getting broadband, or any degree of it, but a new generation of broadband is coming that will further disadvantage them.

Can the Minister give us the definition of broadband? Is a minimum speed required to qualify? I think that BT sometimes plays fast and loose on this matter. A constituent of mine, David Barwick in Gladestry, had the mishap of being DACSed, which sounds quite painful. He explained to me that he was able to get broadband at 46 kilobits a second, which does not seem very broad to me, but that as a result of DACS—the digital access carrier system—his speed has gone down to 28 kilobits per second, which is almost useless. In that little community several energetic entrepreneurs could, if they had the right facilities, expand their businesses and be able to stay there and continue to operate.

Broadband is only part of the communications problem for rural areas. A number of my constituents—I am sure that this applies in the constituencies of other hon. Members present—do not have mobile phone reception, and some do not have television reception. Some did not even have mains electricity until recently and had to use generators. They managed to get it at a cost of £20,000 or £30,000 per household. So, facilities that many people take for granted are not universally available to rural people.

I am worried about the commitment of the communications industry, and BT in particular, to keeping up the infrastructure in rural areas. One problem is that copper wires, and in some cases aluminium wires, which are of even less use, are falling into disrepair. BT seems loth to renew them and bring them up to standard.

Alun Michael: Like the hon. Gentleman, I was given the impression that aluminium is a complete blockage and that it must be stripped out if it is an obstruction, but it is not an inhibitor in itself, although it has different characteristics from copper. There is a degree of confusion, and people need to go into detail where there is a problem with aluminium; it is not the complete problem that we believed it to be a few years ago.

Mr. Williams: I thank the Minister for that. I am no expert on the technical aspects of this issue, but although I lack technical knowledge, even I can understand that it is not a good idea for BT to take its wires down off poles and put them on the tops of hedges. When the farmers come along in the autumn and cut the hedges, they do not do the cables much good. Constituents of mine in certain parts of Wales have been out of order for up to two weeks. For them, broadband seems a luxury beyond all aspiration compared with just having a telephone.

Unless one has a decent line, one cannot get broadband. A number of my constituents who live quite close to upgraded exchanges have had the experience that was described earlier of ordering equipment and finding that they could not use it. Ministers in Wales have given a commitment to a roll-out right across Wales—I have the press release here—but even if every exchange were upgraded, that would not mean that broadband would become a universal facility for my constituents.

I shall conclude with a short account of a couple of my constituents' experiences. James Tenant in Ystradfellte is an able young man who wants to set up as a music producer, but he needs a large broadband capacity to do so. He has had grants from the local authority and the Assembly, but unless the new cable to Ystradfellte is optic fibre, he will have to move out of that community.

Mary Myaya works as a freelance world health consultant in Colva, which is the centre of Radnorshire—almost the centre of the universe, as far as I am concerned. She cannot get broadband and tells me that she gets better access to it when she is working in Mozambique, which is the sixth poorest country in the world, than she does in Wales.

To top things off, I tell hon. Members about Julian Salmon, who is the director of the Country Land and Business Association in Wales. He operates out of his farm in my constituency, and told me, of his attempts to access a service at home last Tuesday:

> "After fifty-six minutes and losing the connection three times I abandoned the attempt."

He then came to London and was able to complete the process in three or four minutes. That is the difference: some people have to try to operate businesses and conduct their lives in rural areas without broadband, and others have that facility.

3.20 pm

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing this valuable debate. I apologise for missing part of his opening speech.

I was fascinated by the question asked by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), which was, "How do we define broadband?" It is a key question, to which I shall return shortly. I realise that when people think of Milton Keynes they think of a city, but I am sure that many hon. Members realise that it is both a city and a rural community. As Milton Keynes expanded sideways, it isolated a large rural tip of what was Buckinghamshire and is now part of the unitary authority of Milton Keynes.

In the short time available, I want to do three things. First, I want to explain the unique problems that Milton Keynes faces in accessing broadband. Secondly, I want to look at the options and why they seem to be failing to deliver the solution. Finally, I want to consider what is required to deliver broadband throughout Milton Keynes.

High-speed internet access and digital TV are two vital aspects of the information age and are directly linked. People who have access to such services will be better informed, better entertained and better employed. People who are left behind by the information age will be left behind, to an increasing extent, in modern life. Broadband is not just about game playing and video downloading; it is vital for the economic growth of Milton Keynes.

[Mr. Mark Lancaster]

Some residents and businesses in Milton Keynes still cannot get broadband at all. Some can get only an entry-level speed of 512 kilobits per second. It is particularly important for Milton Keynes to have an adequate data communications facility, because of the impact that it has on jobs. Both those who work in offices and professionals who work from home in the city and the rural community depend on data speeds that do not seem quaint and primitive to the rest of the country and the rest of the world.

In Milton Keynes, we have a TV cable network that was the envy of the UK when it was built in the '60s and '70s. TV signals received on a big aerial were wired into every new home in the new city and in the rural community, together with some pioneering community TV channels. Although the original local channels were sadly short lived, I am delighted that the situation looks to be resolved when the much-wanted and much-needed MKTV is launched later this year.

The original technology was modern for its time, but not future-proofed. The original cabling is old and incapable of providing internet. BT's telephone lines, the most popular way of accessing the internet, are now either too long or too narrow to support the technology. That problem is made worse by their routing around the grid squares in the city.

A new digital TV distribution network, providing digital TV to every home that receives TV on a communal analogue cable, would also be able to carry high-speed broadband. A digital network does not care what the content is. One member of the household could be watching a documentary on BBC 9, while another could be surfing the web. Another could be buying a video from a streaming video provider to watch over the weekend, or making a video-conference webcast to another head office in another country. Those are all data that can educate, inform, entertain and help Milton Keynes's residents in both the city and the rural community.

When the area was first developed, in recognition of the fact that houses did not need aerials and that aerials are pretty unsightly if they are not necessary, areas of the then rural community were developed with covenants and restrictions so that most homes are not allowed to put an aerial on the roof. The special problem for Milton Keynes is that if home owners are not allowed to put up their own aerials and the TV cabling throughout the city cannot transmit digital TV, local people will have a problem if and when analogue TV stops being transmitted. If the Government are committed to the digital information age being made available to all citizens, not just those with the finances to buy their own solution, that problem could be used to everybody's advantage.

That is the problem that we face in Milton Keynes. It is appalling for a dynamic, prosperous, high-tech rural and city community. I want now to turn to some of the proposals and explain why, regrettably, there is concern that they may not provide the solution. To its credit, BT has done a good job of getting entry-level broadband to many parts of the unitary authority that two years ago could not get it, although some areas cannot get any broadband. However, most areas cannot get the speed that most people are clamouring for.

BT is focusing on its 21st century network—21CN—programme, which replaces the old telephone wire infrastructure with fibre-optic technology. Understandably, BT does not want to invest any more in the old telephone cabling, but 21CN is a long-term programme that will not be rolled out in Milton Keynes until at least 2010. That is where the link to digital TV returns.

If a digital community TV service were to be wired to every home in the city, it would resolve the problems that BT is struggling with, replacing the '60s technology with modern technology. That is much the same for the rural community, which will of course soon become city in Milton Keynes. We have the grid-road cabling ducts and, largely, the right technology in the exchanges. The link into each home seems to be solvable. However, what is missing, from BT's point of view, is any public money to rewire the main trunking networks across the unitary authority.

Perhaps the residents should look to other providers. One of the frustrations locally is the plethora of advertisements from other companies offering broadband to residents. Seeing a potential solution, residents ring, only to be disappointed. In that process, called local loop unbundling, a third party company takes over a phone line from BT. In practice, they use the same telephone wires that BT used, so we are still stuck with no or slow broadband.

Milton Keynes council has no direct responsibility to provide facilities for broadband, but it has been proactive in trying to find a wireless solution. I commend the council for that. However, the problem is that that technology, WiMAX, is still unproven. It is still being evaluated by the internet service providers. Although it is widely believed that wireless technology would be suited to the rural areas of Milton Keynes, it might not prove to be a Milton Keynes-wide solution and might not be appropriate for servicing large numbers of residents in higher-density areas.

Before I look to the future, I want to mention Ofcom's involvement. There have been efforts to interest Ofcom in Milton Keynes's problems. However, the telecommunications regulator's remit for internet access is unimpressive. It simply has to ensure that all UK residents can get dial-up access at a speed of 28.8 kilobits per second—20 times slower than the slowest broadband. It seems incredible in 2006 that BT is not obliged to provide anything faster.

I want to consider what might work in future. There is a strong belief that Milton Keynes's problems with broadband and digital TV can be resolved together. We need a credible, proven and sustainable alternative to BT in the form of a decent cable infrastructure. That would introduce real competition for the first time, spurring BT to raise its game. Such an infrastructure would require investment funding. The technology is nothing horrendous, merely an upgraded cable in an underground duct system that allows for technology changes. If it is replaceable, that will ensure that it is future-proof. If we make the ducts big enough, they can contain digital cable this year, optical fibre for the next 10 years and a future cable system beyond that.

I have campaigned long and hard for "I before E", or infrastructure before expansion, for Milton Keynes. Access to high-speed broadband is absolutely essential for a young, prosperous growing community that is the focus of the Government's sustainable communities project. I ask the Government to reconsider the specific issues faced by the community of Milton Keynes.

3.28 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing the debate and on clearly outlining the problems faced by many rural areas, as well as their possible solutions. I recognise many of the problems that hon. Members have raised. I represent a large rural constituency, and BT has enabled all the exchanges for broadband—some of the bigger exchanges with its own money, and some of the smaller exchanges with money from the Scottish Executive. However, despite the exchanges being enabled for broadband, many people in the constituency face problems similar to those raised by other hon. Members, mainly because they are too far from the telephone exchange.

Broadband opens up tremendous opportunities for those who are fortunate enough to be able to access it. The internet opens up opportunities for businesses, for education and for entertainment. However, many websites these days seem to have been designed on the assumption that most users have access to broadband at a fairly high data transfer rate. That means that users without broadband are often faced with a frustrating wait for websites to appear on their screen, or to download material from the internet. Many functions, such as accessing music or film clips, are simply impossible. The consequence is that many people in businesses who do not have broadband access are put at a tremendous disadvantage.

Surveys reveal two big divides. One is between rich and poor; the other is between urban and rural areas. All 10 local authorities with the highest broadband take-up rate are in or just outside Greater London, whereas the authorities with the lowest take-up rate are in rural areas. Take-up rates vary between 25 broadband lines per 100 of population in Wandsworth and fewer than five in Na h-Eileanan an Iar. The discrepancy between urban and rural areas can be seen throughout Britain. Studies show that pupils with internet access tend to perform better than those without, so the discrepancy clearly has worrying implications for the education of children in remote areas who cannot access broadband from their home.

The inability to access broadband from remote areas is also building up economic difficulties for rural areas. These days, access to broadband is vital to running a business from a rural area. A few years ago, there was a vision and a hope that, with the internet, it would be just as easy to run a business from a remote rural area as it was from a city centre. Sadly, we have found that that applies only to businesses that are close enough to a telephone exchange to be able to access broadband.

The European Union and the Government are telling farmers that they must diversify. However, farms are, by their very nature, usually many miles from the nearest telephone exchange, so broadband access via a telephone line is simply not possible.

Alun Michael: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that there are farming businesses that have been very enterprising and which are now running businesses in rural areas that probably could have been run only in the centre of London as recently as three or four years ago?

Mr. Reid: The Minister is right that many farmers have been enterprising and have diversified, but I am sure that he would agree that there is a problem if farmers are too far from a telephone exchange to be able to access broadband. Satellite is one option, but it tends to be more expensive to run than working via a terrestrial line. Also, as we have heard, some functions are simply not possible via satellite.

The Government, the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly have, to their credit, invested large amounts of money, and I pay tribute to them for that. The money has mostly been given to BT and has meant that the vast majority of people in the country and the vast majority of businesses are able to access broadband. However, some businesses and people have missed out. As was pointed out, the success for the vast majority of people in the country does mean problems for the small number of people in remote areas who cannot access broadband.

According to the official statistics, 99.6 to 99.7 per cent. of households could access broadband using some form of terrestrial technology available on the mass market. However, that leaves some 200,000 people behind and, as we have heard—I think that the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) was the first to raise this—the anecdotal evidence is that far more people than that cannot access broadband. Hon. Members have raised another important question: what exactly is the official definition of broadband? As I said, the anecdotal evidence is that more than 200,000 people have problems when trying to access broadband.

I did some research. In November 2003, a representative of the regulator, which at that time was Oftel, appeared before the Trade and Industry Committee. At that time, Oftel defined broadband as "an always-on service with a minimum downstream capacity in excess of 128 kbit/s".

Committee members expressed concern, as I am sure hon. Members will today, that 128 kilobits per second was far too low a transfer rate for a sensible definition of broadband. Research on the Ofcom website did not turn up a revision of the 128 definition. I shall therefore ask the Minister a question that other hon. Members have asked. Can he advise us what definition his Department uses to define broadband when it publishes its statistics showing that 99.7 per cent. of households can access broadband?

People who cannot access broadband because they live too far away from a telephone exchange, whether there are 200,000 such people or more, should not be excluded from the modern digital age. Clearly, the market alone will not provide them with access. Without Government, Scottish Executive and Welsh Assembly intervention, there would not be as many enabled telephone exchanges as there are today. I think that, in Scotland, only one telephone exchange has still to be enabled. Despite that, at least 200,000 people do not have access. As I said, the market alone will not provide, so Government intervention is required.

Previous generations brought roads, public transport, electricity and telephones to remote rural areas. Broadband, because of the education and employment opportunities that it brings, is not a luxury but an essential tool for the 21st century. I therefore look forward to the Minister's reply. I hope that he will say that the Government will sit down with the telecoms industry—obviously, that is mainly BT, but there are other telecoms providers—and the regulator to try to come up with a solution that will make broadband available to all in Britain, no matter where they live.

3.36 pm

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on securing the debate and on the extremely thoughtful and thorough way in which he introduced it. We would all agree that it has been wide ranging. We have dealt with issues facing some of the most rural parts of these islands and have discussed how similar issues affect even the outskirts of some of our major new cities, such as Milton Keynes. We have even touched on broadband access in Mozambique, so we have covered global matters in a rural affairs debate.

More importantly, the debate has been well informed. I hope that the Minister will accept that my hon. Friends' comments do not in any way seek to undermine the villages or rural communities in their constituencies. Rather, those comments arise from a passion to ensure that those communities are well represented. I believe that my hon. Friends won their seats—gained them, in many cases—because they had shown themselves to be doughty champions of those rural communities, standing up for and promoting them when they were doing good things, but not shying away from issues when they saw things that needed to be improved.

The 2006 UK broadband report, covering April to September 2005, stated that broadband is available to 99.7 per cent. of the UK, covering both residential and business users. That percentage means that one and a half constituencies in this country are not covered at all, which puts the issue in context. Listening to my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), I wondered whether his was the one. Overall, however, we recognise how much has been done, although a quite significant element remains to be covered.

The increase in coverage is largely a result of BT's commitment to increasing coverage to 99.6 per cent. of households by the summer of 2005. We all pay tribute to BT for achieving as much as it has. The comments in the debate should be seen in that context: we all recognise how much has been achieved, but attention needs to be given to what remains to be done.

Partnerships involving local government, the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly dealing with British Telecom to enable all exchanges have resulted in improved coverage in sparsely populated areas, and that has been achieved quicker than might have been expected. BT reports that that leaves just 80,000 telephone lines in remote areas without broadband access.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe said, broadband services are provided by one of three means: satellite or wireless; cable operators using the cable television network; and BT over its telephone lines. As he also said, however, there are concerns about whether satellite-based broadband services will be able to support new uses of the internet, specifically teleconferencing, telephony and video games. Perhaps the Minister can confirm the situation in that regard and the long-term picture.

As my hon. Friend also said, cable operators in such a profit-conscious sector of the industry are unlikely to expand their coverage to 100 per cent. of rural areas owing to the lack of return available to them. It is therefore left to BT to complete the 100 per cent. coverage of UK communities, as it has committed to doing. We should recognise that the British record in rolling out broadband is certainly a good one, as the Minister reminded us. It compares extremely well with other nations, and Britain has one of the most developed broadband services anywhere in the world, probably including Mozambique, although it may lag behind some in terms of cost and speed. We have also heard that the very success of the British record puts those without broadband access at a distinct disadvantage. During the quarter ending in September 2005, broadband connections totalled 8.9 million, which marked a 12 per cent. increase in new subscriptions over the previous quarter and a 25 per cent. increase since the end of March 2005.

We all recognise that information communication technology has a vital part to play as part of the Lisbon strategy in making Europe the most competitive and dynamic knowledge-based economy in the world. However, for that to happen, we must ensure that rural communities are not left out.

British Telecom states that in my county of East Sussex 99.8 per cent. of households now have access to broadband. Through a public-private partnership, East Sussex county council has promoted the advantages of broadband and achieved 28.1 per cent. take-up in September. It is forecast to achieve 30 per cent. by December, which is ahead of the 28 per cent target for the end of this year. I hope that the Minister will accept that it is no wonder that that Conservative-controlled county council has received national awards for its highly successful programme, especially when the broadband take-up just 18 months ago was a mere 5 per cent. Just as we have been willing to accept what the Government have done, I hope that he will be willing to recognise what a Conservative county council has achieved. However, highly commendable as the figures are, they show that a small minority in my constituency, as in those of other hon. Members, continues to be left out.

Serious concerns have rightly been raised about rural communities that do not have access to good internet services. It is harder for rural communities that lack good internet access to attract and retain jobs. The report following the symposium on remote and rural communications was published in June 2005. The symposium found that because of their location remote and rural areas had a high demand for communications services. It also found that there was a strong perception of the digital divide between urban and rural areas. It questioned how quick the trickle-down effect of the benefits of service innovation would be to rural areas. There was concern that more remote communities would always be in catch-up mode with their urban counterparts.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs looked at broadband in rural areas, and its 2005 report, "ICT in England's Rural Economies" concluded that the "lack of availability had been the key barrier to adoption for broadband in rural areas".

Among businesses with internet access, 60 per cent. use broadband in urban areas, whereas only 41 per cent. do so in rural areas. There is a significant disparity in usage. The report found that rural businesses are playing catch-up, in that broadband is more widely available and the perception of broadband availability appears to be lagging behind the reality in rural areas.

However, it is clear that broadband connectivity speeds are lower in rural areas, with businesses being more likely to use basic broadband services. Of urban business broadband users, 63 per cent. have connectivity rates faster than 512 kilobits per second, whereas that is the case for only 37 per cent. of rural businesses. When the Minister replies, I should be grateful if he would relate that to compliance with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which clearly requires people to be given greater access to all services. Last weekend, I viewed the work being done by a company in my constituency. Internet Architects have been doing fantastic work for the National Trust, enabling it to comply with the legislation by providing virtual tours of some of its properties. However, if people do not have access to broadband, they cannot download virtual tours. Perhaps the Minister will explain what has happened about compliance under the disability discrimination laws.

There is clearly a different picture in different parts of the country. Northern Ireland was the first region in Europe to have 100 per cent. broadband coverage. The Northern Ireland experience resulted in tangible results on the economy and on jobs, including teleworking, and there were particular benefits for female and part-time workers and for carers.

Scotland has achieved similar success. As we have heard, the Scottish Executive undertook an open procurement exercise, which aimed to deliver affordable broadband access to every Scottish community by the end of 2005. Only one small area is outstanding. The strategy saw the Scottish population's access to affordable broadband rise from 43 per cent. at the launch to more than 93 per cent. in February 2005. We should recognise that that covers some of the most remote parts of the United Kingdom.

If Scotland and Northern Ireland have achieved 100 per cent. coverage, the coverage in England must be lower than the 99.7 per cent. achieved throughout the country as a whole. We heard about progress in Wales from the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) and from my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones). We heard about the progress, but my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire stated clearly that significant improvements are needed.

I have sympathy with the comments made by my hon. Friends the Members for Preseli Pembrokeshire and for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) that it is not good enough to apply for broadband with all the headache and heartache that goes with that only to be told later that it will not be possible. People want certainty and to know that when they start on the process, they will be told what the situation really is. We should all try to ensure that people have greater certainty of what is available to them.

Currently, 69 per cent. of UK firms use broadband and 30 per cent. of micro-businesses trade online. Approximately 73 per cent. of businesses provide information about products and services online. That will increase significantly when the Company Law Reform Bill comes into effect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe, who opened the debate, identified the key issues. What analysis has the Minister made of where those rural communities without broadband access are concentrated, and what is his Department doing to assist broadband provision in rural areas? What role does he see for the key players—regional development authorities, Openreach, Ofcom and the Department of Trade and Industry—in addressing the issues, and what can he do to bring them together to move that forward?

The Minister will be well aware that our rural communities are going through a period of transition. Old businesses, such as pubs, shops and garages, are closing, but exciting and dynamic new businesses are opening up, including voluntary organisations. That successful transition depends on having access to the most advanced technology available. If those businesses are to compete and operate effectively, they need broadband access quickly. I hope that the Minister will explain how that can happen.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow quoted from a letter from the Minister on 24 January which said:

"Stimulating broadband availability across the whole of the UK is a Government priority. We want to see all communities, irrespective of location, having access to an affordable broadband service from a competitive market."

I hope that the Minister can tell us now how he plans to achieve that goal.

3.48 pm

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): It is a particular pleasure to sit under your chairmanship this afternoon, Mr. Jones, but it must be frustrating for you, given your interest in science and technology and the fact that you have passionately and successfully represented a rural area for as long as I have been in Parliament. I am almost as frustrated because while I want to congratulate the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on raising a subject about which I am a great enthusiast, it is frustrating to find that I would need special, high-speed broadband and a new form of multi-streaming that would probably defeat even the excellence of our Hansard writers to fit in all that I want to say in response to the many points that have been raised on a highly technical issue. I undertake to write to all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate setting out my response in more detail, which may help them in responding to local issues raised by their constituents.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) acknowledged our success in delivering rural broadband. It is a new experience for me to be criticised by Conservative Members for being too successful with something, but with the new spirit of honest debate perhaps it will happen more often.

[Alun Michael]

My plea about not talking down rural areas was very much in the same spirit as the response of the hon. Member for Wealden. I did not think that any hon. Members intended to do that, but it is a danger if we focus on difficulties that relate to a very small percentage of those who might want to take up broadband, and give the impression that rural areas are somehow a no-go area. During my four years as Minister for Rural Affairs, I saw an enormous burgeoning of activities carried out in rural areas by small, successful and dynamic businesses taking the initiative and taking the opportunities offered by broadband access. I want us to focus on the difficult areas that hon. Members have mentioned and on talking up the economic capacity provided and the opportunities for rural areas.

In other words, we should be ambitious for the success of rural businesses. The hon. Member for Wealden was right when he talked about take-up lagging behind, probably for reasons of perception. There has been a catching-up—the figures show that there has been an acceleration in the take-up of broadband in rural areas—but initially the fact that people did not believe it would be provided was an obstacle. Of course, the succession of events must be to allow access by enabling people to take up broadband, to get them to take it up, get them to use it and get them use the whole range of capacity available to them. Many people are using only a small percentage of the capacity of broadband or their computers, and we must expand that usage.

In passing, I have to say I was rather surprised to hear some Opposition Members seeming to call for public handouts to solve some of the problems that are actually being solved by the market and a strong partnership between business and the Government. Indeed, during the past four or five years we have seen an excellent story, which has shown the capacity of business, local communities, small businesses and social enterprises to solve problems that at one stage seemed insurmountable in order to transform totally access to broadband in this country.

As several hon. Members acknowledged, we have a great deal to be proud of in the United Kingdom. The Government set an ambitious target of having the most extensive broadband coverage in the G7 by the end of 2005 and met that target by June 2005, with 99 per cent. of households having access to at least one broadband technology solution, and with more than 50 per cent. having access to more than one. If there is time, I shall return to those figures. In addition, the UK is ranked first on regulatory environment and has one of the most competitive broadband markets in the G7.

I come to the debate with some knowledge of the history because four years ago, when I was Minister for Rural Affairs, most people regarded the likelihood of delivering widespread broadband as an unattainable dream. I am pleased to have the chance to pay tribute to those at Department of Trade and Industry who responded vigorously to the challenge. One of my predecessors, who is now the Minister for Pensions Reform, established a joint DTI and Department for Environment Food and Rural Affairs rural broadband unit, running a £30 million broadband fund for the regions, and the DTI team, led by Stephen Speed, devoted significant time to persuading operators to roll out broadband to rural areas.

I was pleased when the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) said the enabling of exchanges is no longer an issue. It certainly was an issue at that point, and I remember well some local campaigns aimed at getting enough people to sign up for broadband to get the numbers past the threshold for particular exchanges. I acknowledged the success of "Switch on Shropshire", which built on the example of my then Parliamentary Private Secretary, Peter Bradley, who joined forces with what was then the Country Landowners Association. A combination of a Labour MP and the CLA may not be what people might expect, but it was a successful partnership in getting people to want to sign up, which challenged BT to deliver as a result.

BT also responded to the challenge of providing broadband infrastructure. When I first went to DEFRA, the figures for some exchanges were not being provided, which meant that we did not know what the target was in a particular rural town or village. Fairly early after his arrival, I met Pierre Danone, the head of BT Wholesale, and it became clear very quickly that Ben Verwaayen, in taking over BT, had changed the culture to one that asked, "How do we solve the problems and provide the service?" instead of, "How do we explain to you why we cannot do what you want to do?" That change has led to some of the comments made, quite rightly, by hon. Members about the changed performance of BT in this area.

Comparisons have been made with other services, such as the electricity supply. I have to say that the last remote farmhouse in England received an electricity supply only recently. I remember the excitement 40 years ago with which Taid Mon, my grandfather in Anglesey, received an electricity supply for the first time because, at last, the electricity supply had got close enough to his small cottage for the connection to be affordable and economic.

Recent market research shows that there are more than 10 million broadband connections in the UK, which represents a 41 per cent. growth since March 2005, providing the UK with more connections than any other European country.

Mr. Roger Williams: Will the Minister give way?

Alun Michael: I have said that I will respond to any point, and to supplementary points from individuals, but I want to cover as many of the questions as I can.

A question was asked about the breakdown of the 99 per cent. figure. I understand that the BT claim refers to UK households connected to enabled exchanges. A question was raised about public money going to BT. Where that has happened, it has happened as a result of competitive tendering to upgrade facilities that BT considered not to be economically viable. It is also important to acknowledge that many factors, such as home wiring, can affect performance of digital subscriber lines, which provide DSL broadband access.

In relation to the questions asked by the hon. Member for Wycombe in his introduction, the problem is that there is no detailed analysis of the 0.2 per cent. figure to which we both referred, except in the region-by-region analysis of what is thought to be the nature of the problem. The matter only comes to light when a request for a DSL is attempted, and it is discovered that the line is one of the few that has a problem.

On the commitment of the DTI, we are leading the broadband debate. We are pursuing solutions with operators and we greatly welcome the sort of interest expressed by hon. Members today. Once we get past the national and regional issues, the matter often amounts drilling down to discover where the specific problems are—they may be in an individual line or a very small locality—and finding solutions to them.

Regional development agencies and devolved Administrations have supported a variety of projects such as Fibrespeed in Wales, Cybermoor, Digital Region and "Act Now" in Cornwall, to which I referred earlier. "Act Now" was a particular success story that received objective 1 funding and experienced another of the consequences of success, when villages just outside the defined area for the pilot project got very aerated about the fact that they were not involved and campaigned to be included. In the end, a much bigger area was enabled without additional expenditure and there was a considerable extension of take-up, which is one of the reasons why BT realised there was a bigger market than had been anticipated in some of the low-population rural areas.

RDA, devolved Administration and local government intervention requires careful consideration of the impact in relation to market failure. We should not invest money if the market is able to supply the service, but on the other hand, it is appropriate to invest where there are clear market failures. Indeed, organisations such as the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly have identified such places as appropriate ones in which to intervene.

The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) asked about the figures given by the Countryside Alliance. I am afraid that it is beyond my remit to answer for the Countryside Alliance, an organisation which, as we know from its public opinion surveys, is arithmetically challenged in the extreme. As far as I am aware, there are no figures that provide the answer to the question, so I have no clue where the Countryside—

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next subject for debate.

Water (Kent)

4 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): When I applied for this debate on the acute water scarcity that we in Kent face, I said to myself, "I guarantee from the moment this debate is granted, the heavens are going to open," which they promptly did. I am glad that the debate has achieved at least one thing, a short period of rainfall in Kent, but I should like to make it clear to the House and to the Minister that the limited amount of rain in the past few days will make no material difference to the serious water supply situation that we face in our county.

The water supply situation in Britain varies enormously from region to region. As we know, the region that is facing much the most serious situation is the south-east, following two exceptionally dry winters. Last month's Environment Agency publication, "Drought prospects 2006", stated:

> "Across south east England, rainfall over the last 16 months has been much lower than for the same period in 1974–76, and in some places it is the lowest since 1921. Continued dry weather through the spring and into the summer would give us one of the most serious droughts of the last hundred years."

Last month, the Environment Agency called on all water companies in the south-east to introduce hosepipe bans. The agency's chief executive, Barbara Young, gave a dire and serious warning on 24 February. She said:

> "If water companies delay introducing hosepipe bans now, extreme steps to manage water supplies over the summer may be needed, such as standpipes and rota cuts."

This week, the largest water supply company in the south-east and indeed in Britain, Thames Water, with 8 million customers, announced an indefinite ban on hosepipes and sprinklers from 3 April. It is the first such ban that the company has had to announce for 15 years, indicating the severity of the situation in its area.

If the water supply situation is bad in the south-east in general, it is worst of all in Kent and some areas of Sussex. They are in the worst position in the worst affected region. The briefing note that Southern Water supplied to me for this debate illustrates the position in Kent and at the Bewl reservoir, which is very close to my constituency. The briefing says:

> "Bewl Water, the largest reservoir in the South East, which provides water to Southern Water, Mid Kent and indirectly to South East Water is only 53 per cent. full (this is the lowest level it has ever been this time of the year), normally, we would expect it to be 97 per cent. full at this time of year."

The largest reservoir in Kent and in the south-east is effectively only half full—unprecedentedly low.

The aquifer position is no better. Southern Water's briefing says:

> "Groundwater levels in the major aquifers in the South East of England, which support approximately 70 per cent. of public water abstraction are all below average. Some are approaching historic minimum levels."

In addition, the position in the eastern part of the county has been well reported. Folkestone and Dover Water Services has had to become the first water company in Britain to apply for and receive "water scarcity status" under the Water Industry Act 1999. The Government have granted it, enabling Folkestone and

[Sir John Stanley]

Dover Water Services to become the first company to introduce to its area compulsory water metering. It clearly demonstrates the severity of the situation that we face in the south-east and, particularly, in Kent.

I should like to raise several issues with the Minister. First, we have had two exceptionally dry winters in succession. During the winter months, the crucial restoration and replenishment of water supply to reservoirs and aquifers is due. There is an important question to pose to the Government and the water companies, to which it is crucial to obtain the right answer—as can best be foreseen. We have effectively experienced a semi-drought in Kent and parts of the south-east during the past 18 months. Is it freak, one-off climate change, or is it evidence of a long-term and more permanent move to more arid conditions in the south-east and Kent as a result of climate change?

Day by day, as the evidence is constantly and rightly put before us, we all see that the predictions about the rate of climate change have if anything been understatements. The rate at which, for example, the Greenland ice cap is melting exceeds almost everybody's previous predictions.

It is demonstrable that, with Kent's existing water resources, we are already at the tipping point of standpipes and rota cuts. That is after just two winters of semi-drought. If that is the position after just two winters, we are wholly inadequately prepared for something that will continue for a much longer period. Its potentially extraordinarily serious consequences may not be too far around the corner for people living in Kent and elsewhere in the south-east.

From the scientific and meteorological advice that the Minister receives, what is the best judgment about the climate change that Kent has experienced during the past 18 months? Is it a one-off situation that is likely to reverse, or is it evidence of a much more permanent climate situation in the south-east and Kent? There will be serious consequences if it is the latter.

The second issue that I want to raise with the Minister is about the relationship between water supply in Kent and the Government's plans for development, particularly residential development, in the county. The Government want to carry out a major expansion of population in the south-east. It is a controversial decision that a number of us contest strongly. The position as of today is that, at the Government's instigation, the South East England regional assembly has approved in principle 578,000 new homes in Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Berkshire, Hampshire, Oxfordshire and the Thames gateway by 2026. Many questions are being asked in Kent and elsewhere about whether the water supply is adequate to support that huge population influx.

The Minister made a water-focused visit to Essex recently—on 9 February, I think. He visited a new house in Heybridge, which apparently had water-saving fittings. He said that the Government's plans for hundreds of thousands of new properties would still go ahead. Therefore, I must ask him the following question: if with the existing population in Kent and elsewhere in the south-east we are already on the tipping edge of having standpipes and rota cuts, how on earth will the south-east be able to cope with 500,000 more houses—the figure is of course substantially higher if one adds up the extra adults and children? How are we going to cope in water terms with the huge development expansion that the Government propose? I see no sense at all in concentrating such a huge additional residential development in the driest part of our country, when the water position is already very serious.

The next issue I wish to raise is regional disparities in the United Kingdom. I understand that moving large quantities of water about is an expensive and difficult business; it is much more problematic than moving around electricity and even gas. However, there are great regional disparities in respect of water. What are the Government's policies for gradually removing those disparities, for establishing what would effectively be some sort of national water grid, and for putting in place the infrastructure to enable water to be moved about more freely between different regions? That would create greater equality of treatment and fairness for water customers in the different regions of Britain.

I turn now to capacity and, so far as Kent is concerned, to the issue of reservoirs in particular. We need additional capacity in Kent, or additional capacity that is accessible from Kent. For this debate, I went through the ever-growing files in my office on water supply, and I came across a leaflet that was produced 15 years ago—in December 1991. It is entitled, "Water for the future in Kent; development plans". It was a summary leaflet for public consumption produced by the consulting engineers to three of the leading water companies in Kent. They were looking into the future of water supply in Kent on behalf of Mid Kent Water, Southern Water and what was then called the Folkestone and District Water Company and is now called Folkestone and Dover Water Services.

In the section referring to the then proposed major new reservoir development at Broad Oak, that 15-year-old leaflet stated:

> "The promotion of Broad Oak water will be continued. No other major resource has been identified which will meet the remaining water supply needs in the companies' areas economically for the next 30 years."

It continued, extraordinarily prophetically:

> "Water supply from Broad Oak water will be needed between 2000 and 2005".

That was bang on the nail. The reality is that no progress whatever has been made in bringing into being Broad Oak water—or, indeed, in establishing other major additional reservoir capacity in Kent. What is the Government's position on establishing further reservoir capacity in Kent, on Broad Oak, and on the plans that I believe exist for increasing the capacity of Bewl, which is one of the largest reservoirs we have?

My next topic is desalination. You might be as amazed as I am, Mr. Jones, that I have to raise that matter. It is extraordinary to me that in our country, which over the years has produced more jokes about rainfall than any other country, we should now be having to talk about desalination plants in the UK. I know from the briefing I had from South East Water that it is now running a trial desalination plant on the Sussex coast. What is the Government's position on going down the desalination route? Is that now thought to be necessary to ensure that we have adequate water supplies? It is costly, but there is huge potential capacity in desalinating the sea to produce fresh water.

On compulsory metering, Folkestone and Dover Water Services now has water scarcity status, which enables it to introduce compulsory water metering. Does the Minister think that all the water companies in Kent and elsewhere in the south-east should be going down that route? Is he positively soliciting applications from the water companies to his Department? Are the Government in favour now of introducing compulsory water metering in the south-east generally? What steps do they propose to take to ensure that those on low incomes—pensioners and low-income families—are able to get assistance with the installation of water meters if they are made compulsory as a result of their water company being given water scarcity status?

We all know that one of the most effective ways of increasing water capacity is by stopping the water leaking into the ground and disappearing for good, but a substantial amount of leakage still takes place. However, there is always a cost-benefit equation in respect of leaks; some leaks are so small that the cost of stemming them is too great for it to make sense to spend the money to do so. How well—or otherwise—does the Minister think the water companies in Kent are doing in terms of leaks? Inevitably, when one asks the water companies about their leaks programmes and whether they are doing all they can to stop leaks, they all reply, "Well, we're busting our guts to deal with leaks." That is of course the company position, and one would expect the company's representatives to repeat it, but does the Minister think that the Kent water companies are doing all they reasonably can to deal with leaks? If not, it would be helpful if he were to identify which of the companies are not doing sufficiently well and could do more.

I also have a few comments to make on changing lifestyles. We all have a responsibility to try to conserve water. I was struck by one amazing statistic from South East Water: if all 19 million customers in south-east England turned off the tap when they brushed their teeth, we would save 380 million litres of water every day. I found that statistic staggering; I trust that South East Water has it right. It illustrates how, with a relatively small change of lifestyle, we could make the water available go much further. I should like to know what support and publicity the Government are prepared to put behind making the lifestyle changes necessary to make water go further.

In conclusion, we face a serious situation in Kent. It would be totally unacceptable if later this year we turned on the taps in Kent and found that nothing was coming out, if people were made to go to standpipes to collect water for their homes and if mains water were switched off by rota for several hours. My constituents and many others would think the Government extraordinarily incompetent in allowing such a situation to arise, and I would have every sympathy with that view.

4.21 pm

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): It is nice to see you in the Chair this afternoon, Mr. Jones.

I was interested in what the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) had to say, and I congratulate him on securing this debate on a very important issue. I also congratulate him on being able to pull information from a file that goes back to 1991—I wish I could keep files in my office for that long. His archive must be very impressive.

The issues raised by the right hon. Gentleman are clearly important. I agreed with just about everything he said until the very last bit of his speech; it was a bit harsh to suggest that the Government can control the weather. We can control a few things, but periodic droughts are not among them.

Not unreasonably, the right hon. Gentleman asked whether we were seeing a trend, and whether droughts are a long-term issue. It is fair to say that they are not a new phenomenon. There have been a number of them over the years, and it is likely that we shall have them in future. However, we cannot be complacent; we know that climate change is a reality. There may well be issues of water supply in the south-east, and we have to address them in our plans.

I shall outline the kind of measures that are in place. All water companies, including those that serve the right hon. Gentleman's constituency, are obliged by law to have drought plans. They have to have such provisions as a contingency plan, so that, when there are periods of drought, they are prepared and can ensure that people's water supply is maintained.

Although water resources are very low, I would not argue that we were in a crisis. Water reserves need to be maintained carefully and companies are right to apply hosepipe and sprinkler bans. Sprinklers use enormous quantities of water and, in mid-Kent, bans have been in place since last summer—quite a long time. Hosepipe and sprinkler bans are under the companies' control. It is entirely up to them when they introduce them.

The companies have to apply for drought permits and emergency drought orders as part of their contingency planning and drought plans. They can also make applications for permits to abstract additional water, for example. That is being done in the case of Bewl reservoir; additional water is being abstracted from the River Medway during the winter period to bring up the supply. I appreciate that the reservoir is only about half full, but that is a big improvement on its levels earlier this winter.

The right hon. Gentleman was correct: this winter has been exceptionally dry. He was also right to say that, in some parts of the south-east, recorded rainfall has been at its lowest level since 1921, and that such low levels could develop into one of the most serious droughts of the past 100 years. Whether they do depends on whether there are higher than average rainfalls between now and the summer, and that is difficult to predict. We have to take issues of drought management into account.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the expansion of the number of homes. That issue is often raised with me. Given that there are issues of supply management now, it is not unreasonable of people to ask what will happen in future, when there will have been a big expansion in the number of homes. There is a need for additional homes in his area. As he stated, that has been recognised by the regional assembly. We will, of course, have to ensure that there is the infrastructure for water, among other things, to provide for that expansion. All water companies are obliged to have a 25-year forward plan to anticipate increased demand. They may well have to make additional investment to boost their reserves and to ensure that they can meet that demand.

There is an issue of managing the demand for water resources. New homes are designed to be much more water efficient. The average new home built now is about 30 per cent. more water efficient than existing ones. There is more that we can do—we can label products, for example. A lot of dishwashers and washing machines are much more efficient than those of the past. Simple measures can be taken.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a house that I visited. As an experiment, each of its rooms were metered as part of looking at the issue of supply management. The company told me that water consumption was cut significantly by such things as low-pressure shower heads, low-pressure taps and dual flush systems in the toilet. The modest additional cost of such water-saving measures was about £50 to £60.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, there are issues to do with not wasting water, and I shall touch on them as well. It is true that there are plans for a new reservoir at Broad Oak, and that is obviously part of the forward look that the companies involved need to take. There are also plans to raise the banks at Bewl; just raising banks can significantly increase capacity. That option is attractive because no planning permission for building a brand new reservoir is required, although it would probably have to go through the planning process, and it is comparatively easy to do.

There are a number of applications for desalination plants in the south and south-east. The Government view is that such plants have downsides. They are very energy-intensive, and we have to take that into account. However, they are being considered, although not necessarily as a means of providing a constant supply of water. There are peaks of water demand, just as there are peaks of energy demand, and a desalination plant could be switched on for the peak period and then switched off, so that its energy use would be minimised.

We have to consider desalination plants as part of a range of measures, which include man management, supply management and addressing rates of leakage, which was rightly mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. Such measures also involve considering whether water transfer within regions can be improved.

We have asked the Environment Agency to consider the idea of a national grid, but there are downsides to that. It would be very costly, the water would have to be pumped around, which would be very energy intensive, and there would be lots of environmental issues around building the pipelines. There might well be less environmental impact and it might well be more cost-effective if water supply reserves in a region were improved, rather than putting the money into a national grid. However, we do not rule such things out. It is important to have an open mind on how we address such measures and to weigh up the arguments for and against them.

There has been no change to the Government's policy on national compulsory meters. There is not an argument for a national approach. As the right hon. Gentleman said, under the Water Acts, there are provisions for water-scarce areas. Companies have the right to bring forward proposals and we will consider those on their merits. I do not know whether any other proposals are being put forward. Following a manifesto commitment, we recently set up the water saving group, which I chair, as the Minister responsible. That has brought the whole industry together. One of the things that we will consider is how we can raise awareness in the way that the right hon. Gentleman rightly suggested, and how we can get the message over to people that simple steps can be taken to cut water demand. We want to work with the industry on how to address both supply and demand management.

Mr. Martyn Jones (in the Chair): Order. Time is up. We must move on to the next debate.

Rowing Safety

4.30 pm

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): I am grateful for having been granted this debate. My purpose in seeking it was to draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and his ministerial colleagues the dismal failure of the Amateur Rowing Association safely to regulate its sport. That failure is putting young lives at risk. I hope to encourage my right hon. Friend to recognise that the time has come for the Government to intervene and, if necessary, to legislate to ensure proper safety standards in the sport.

I start by outlining the reason for my interest in the matter. My constituents Jane and Stephen Blockley first approached me in August 2002. Their son Leo died in a tragic rowing accident. He drowned in the River Ebro while rowing with the Oxford university lightweight rowing club at its winter training camp in Amposta, Spain, in December 2000. Leo Blockley was 21 years old.

Leo's crew, the crew of another eight from the club, and two launches carrying their coaches ran into adverse weather conditions during a training session. The water was described as only "slightly choppy" at the start of the outing, but the weather changed suddenly. Leo's boat was quickly swamped by 2-ft waves and, lacking inherent buoyancy, it began to sink, forcing the crew into the water. Four of the crew, including Leo, became separated from the boat. After initially trying to swim for the bank, the four realised that the waves and currents would prevent them from reaching the shore. Two were successful in their attempt to return to the partially submerged boat, and another eventually made it to the bank. Little over 50 m from the rowing club from which they had embarked, Leo disappeared as he attempted to swim back to the boat.

The other Oxford university eight rowing on the river at the same time sank twice on its way back to shore, but eventually made it. While all that was happening, the coaches on the two launches were unable to offer the help that they might normally be expected to give. One of the launches got into difficulty when a rope fouled the propeller; it was blown against the bank and became wedged under a branch. The second launch went to help the first, sending the vulnerable eights back upstream alone. As a result of the outing, nine people were treated for exposure and hypothermia and 14 suffered exposure and shock. The significance of staying with the boat and of hypothermia are matters to which I will return.

When I first met Jane and Stephen Blockley, the first inquest into the death of their son had already taken place and a verdict of accidental death due to drowning returned. The facts that I have outlined so far surrounding the accident were all confirmed in the coroner's court. At the time, the Blockleys had begun a high-profile and effective campaign to raise awareness of the need for boat buoyancy. Their simple aim, which was shared by others involved in the campaign, was to do all that they could to prevent anyone else from dying in a similar accident in future.

At our first meeting, all the Blockleys asked of me was support for their campaign to ensure that all rowing boats be required to have in-built buoyancy. However, as they pursued that goal, they encountered unexpected resistance from the national governing body for the sport, the Amateur Rowing Association. Their attempts to engage the ARA in a debate on buoyancy were consistently blocked. Correspondence between the Minister and the ARA, and from the ARA to my constituents, led to a growing suspicion on the part of the Blockleys that the original investigation and first inquest had not been presented with all the facts.

The ARA's five-page response to the Minister's inquiries came from Gary Harris, the deputy chairman of the ARA, in a letter dated 24 December 2002. It would appear that the Minister was satisfied with the version of events presented by Mr. Harris; having seen that letter, I can understand why that might have been so.

In his letter Mr Harris says:

"The principal reason Leo Blockley died was that he swam away from the boat."

Mr. Harris did not tell the Minister that the ARA water safety code did not contain any advice about staying with the boat. One of the survivors referred in evidence to being swept away from the boat. It was later established that, in the terrible conditions of unexpectedly high winds, 2-ft waves and strong river currents, becoming separated from the boat was not a matter of choice.

At the first inquest the coroner had been clear about the "stay with the boat" rule, saying:

"Hindsight is a wonderful thing, but none of us here can make comment on what people do in sudden terrifying circumstances".

For the Blockleys, the ARA's insistence that its "stay with the boat" safety advice would have prevented Leo's death seemed tantamount to blaming Leo for his own death. The important lesson that seemed to have been missed was that, had his boat been fully buoyant, he would not have been in the water in the first place.

Alarmingly, at the time of that correspondence between the Minister, the Blockleys and the ARA, Mr. Harris had new evidence about the incident that he did not disclose to the Minister. Indeed, he did not disclose it to the coroner until June 2005, two and a half years later. Meanwhile, the Blockleys investigated further and discovered significant new evidence, much of it concerning lack of safety training and safety planning. That new evidence was so compelling that the south Manchester coroner, Mr. John Pollard, applied to the administrative court to have his original inquest into the death of Leo Blockley set aside.

A second inquest began on 7 October 2005, during which several people gave evidence that the head coach, Leila Hudson, was either drunk or hung-over or both at the time of the accident. The coroner, Mr. Pollard, said:

"the evidence before me clearly shows that there was what might be called a conspiracy, although more accurately should be called an agreement, by a large number of senior officers and senior advisors at the Oxford University lightweight Rowing Club that they would not make publicly known the suggestion that the Head Coach, Leila Hudson, had been suffering from the effects of alcohol at the time of Leo Blockley's death".

The coroner further commented:

"it is a matter of great regret that they felt that the reputation of the rowing club was of greater importance than a full and thorough investigation into the death of a young man who had drowned following participation in a club activity".

[David Heyes]

Mr. Pollard decided that the issues raised by the case could not be adequately covered by a short verdict like accidental death, and he decided to issue a narrative verdict, which gave him more scope for comment. During the second inquest Mr. Pollard identified several contributory safety issues not adequately covered—or not covered at all—in the current ARA water safety code. Consequently, he chose to write a rule 43 letter to the ARA. Mr. Pollard explains the significance of a rule 43 letter thus:

"A Coroner who believes that action should be taken to prevent the recurrence of fatalities similar to those that in respect of which the Inquest is being held may announce at the Inquest that he is reporting the matter in writing to the person or authority who may have power to take such action and he may report the matter accordingly."

Mr. Pollard's rule 43 letter refers to another rule 43 letter issued by the Berkshire coroner in connection with the inquest into the death of 15-year-old Sikander Farooq, who died in January 2005 when his single sculling boat capsized in the River Thames near his Reading rowing club. Sikander drowned having become overwhelmed by the cold after trying to carry out the ARA capsize drill, which at the time took no account of the fact that in the UK inland water temperatures are always cold enough to put people's lives at risk when they are immersed. The Berkshire coroner's rule 43 letter refers to concerns about the wearing of buoyancy aids in training and to evidence given by a junior coach at Reading rowing club that there was peer pressure on juniors not to wear buoyancy aids.

In his rule 43 letter, Mr. Pollard says:

"It would seem that the wearing of personal buoyancy aids could add a degree of safety."

He further addresses the issue of boat buoyancy and refers to considerable evidence about the effect of fitting full buoyancy to racing boats, which he says

"would ensure that in the event of severely adverse weather conditions the boat would not capsize, thus meaning that the crews would not be forced into very cold and dangerous water and thus reducing considerably the likelihood of death from drowning or hypothermia."

Mr. Pollard also agrees with his fellow coroner about the lack of clear guidance to rowing clubs and individual rowers. He states:

"I believe that clearer guidance could and should be given by the ARA which would to a large extent cover the present paucity of such information and indeed that those guidelines should be adopted by the ARA as compulsory safety measures."

Mr. Pollard comments on the fact that if international guidelines and protocols are issued by FISA, the international rowing federation, it is still a matter of choice for the ARA as to whether they are adopted for British Rowing. That is a reference to "FISA's Minimum Guidelines for the Safe Practice of Rowing", which were in draft at the time of the inquest but have since been fully ratified. They state:

"Boats should meet minimum flotation requirements: When full of water a boat with the crew seated in the rowing position should float in such a way that the top of the seat is a maximum of 5 cm . . . below the static water line."

The ARA seems to have chosen not to adopt those simple yet effective and practical guidelines. Being immersed in cold water is extremely dangerous. Death can occur almost instantly at any time during immersion, or even after rescue. Lean, lightly clothed rowers, especially juniors, are among those most susceptible to hypothermia.

The Salvage Association report "Regulation of Rowing in the Upper Reaches of the Tidal Thames", which was commissioned by the Port of London authority, is also relevant. It states that "Swamping . . . carries the additional risk of hypothermia during most of the main rowing season. In view of the relative frequency with which incidences of swamping or capsize and resultant sinking occur, we believe that it is imperative that all boats are sufficiently buoyant."

To summarise, in five years, there have been two incidents involving British rowers that have led to death. In two separate cases in 2005, coroners wrote rule-43 letters calling for the ARA to improve safety measures and drawing attention to the central importance of boat buoyancy. Clearly the coroners in those cases believe that the responsibility for enforcing rowing safety in this country lies with the ARA because they addressed their rule 43 letters to it.

The ARA response to Mr. Pollard, which was penned by Gary Harris, points to the third edition of the ARA water safety code, which mandates:

"Boats constructed after 1st April 2003 must have inherent buoyancy sufficient, together with their oars and sculls, to support a seated crew of the correct design weight in the event of being swamped."

Frankly, that is not good enough. Unlike the FISA buoyancy recommendation, it gives no measurable minimum performance standard and is thus confusing and unenforceable.

In an additional advisory note the ARA suggests that a boat's freeboard might be a useful indicator of buoyancy, but it is not. Gary Harris goes on to say:

"On the option of retro-fitting additional buoyancy to boats built prior to the rule introduced in 2003, this suggested compulsory provision would present clubs with potentially crippling costs that would be disproportionate to the risk involved."

The cost of a new eight boat is between £10,000 and £15,000. The cost of retro-fitting boats is relatively low. I have had example quotes of between £108 and £500 per boat for a "bells and whistles" option. When set against loss of life, I cannot accept the argument that those are crippling costs. Surely there is no more crippling price to pay than the death of one's child.

The ARA is the national governing body of a sport that is increasingly popular, especially with juniors. It is heavily funded by Sport England and lottery money. It is essential that it takes the lead on rowing safety. If it is recognised as the overarching body in all other respects, including the award of Government funding, surely the ARA should take responsibility for safety in the expanding sport of rowing. If that expansion is to continue, it is essential that we change the culture that led to the agreement to keep secret the events in Amposta, which allows the macho defence of peer pressure on people, including the youngest and most inexperienced participants, not to wear personal buoyancy aids.

It is also essential to get away from the insistence that the sport depends on rowers staying with the boat if they find themselves in the water in adverse weather conditions. It is clear from all the evidence that staying in the boat is preferable to staying with the boat almost entirely submerged in cold water, especially in adverse weather conditions.

It is clear to me, and certainly to the Blockleys, that the leading lights at the ARA are set on persisting with their light-touch, amateurish approach to the safe regulation of the sport, even in the face of strong and clear messages from the coroners in their rule 43 letters. The equivocation has to be stopped before we have another tragedy on our hands. It is time to reconsider the legislative route.

There is a precedent for the introduction of legislation after a tragic water sport incident. I remember it well. Then, as now, there were those who claimed that the cost of complying with regulations might prevent participation in the affected sports. Then, as now, there were those who were complacent about the ability of people leading sports clubs and bodies to self-regulate, while others clamoured for safety to be given priority. Then, as now, the affected families mounted a high profile campaign, lobbying their MPs and the then Ministers. That tragedy was the Lyme bay kayaking accident in March 1993, in which four schoolchildren lost their lives.

In the subsequent court case, the judge voiced a clear opinion that self-regulation was inadequate. Initial Government thinking at that time was that further regulation was unnecessary. Eventually, a private Member's Bill resulted in the establishment of the Adventure Activities Licensing Authority. Some believe that the ARA developed its water safety policy at that time as a direct response, in order to avoid being regulated by the new authority. I suggest strongly to the Minister that the time has now come to oblige the ARA to be regulated by this or a new, appropriate, regulatory authority.

To conclude, I hope that the Minister will agree to mount an investigation into whether the actions of the ARA in responding to the coroners' rule 43 letters adequately addressed the safety concerns of the coroners that were expressed in those letters. I hope that he will also agree to intervene to ensure that an effective, workable measurable buoyancy standard is adopted for all boats used in the sport of rowing in the UK, as advised by FISA.

Finally, I should be most grateful if the Minister would agree, on his own behalf or that of one of his colleagues, to meet me and my constituents Jane and Stephen Blockley. The Blockleys have amassed far more evidence in support of their campaign than I have been able to present in a short time today. I would welcome the chance to share that valuable evidence with the Minister or one of his colleagues.

4.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (David Heyes) for having brought this issue to the attention of the House. The Minister for Sport is in Melbourne at the Commonwealth Games and is sorry that he cannot be here.

I know that my hon. Friend will appreciate the fact that few debates in this House are more serious than those that deal with the loss of a young person's life. The death of Leo Blockley in a rowing incident in Spain in December 2000 was a tragedy. The fact that it happened while he was taking part in a sport that he loved, with his whole life ahead of him, made it all the more tragic. I should like to extend the condolences of the House to Leo's family, and to pay tribute to the work they have done in promoting safety in the sport.

The purpose of the debate, as I see it, is to consider whether more should be done to ensure that everybody involved in rowing does all that can be done to maintain the highest standards of safety. I am sure that my hon. Friend will recognise that many recreational sports carry with them an element of risk to personal safety. However, the Government are clear: safety should not and cannot be compromised. That is why an interdepartmental group, led by the Department for Transport, looked closely into the issue in 2002 and published a report called "Inland Water Safety: Present Roles and Responsibilities". The report found that the responsibility for inland water safety was spread across a number of Government Departments and organisations.

One key outcome of the report was the development of the National Water Safety Forum. That brings together, among others, Government Departments, the devolved Administrations, public agencies and governing bodies of sports. The forum includes an advisory group on water sports safety. On safe water sports, the report concluded that the responsibility for the management and regulation of individual sports, including safety, sat principally with the sports' governing bodies.

The Department for Culture, Media and Sport is responsible for setting the overarching strategic framework for sport in England. Our relationship with sport's governing bodies is managed through Sport England and UK Sport, the non-departmental public bodies for sport. Public funding for the governing bodies is provided via Sport England and UK Sport according to a range of criteria, including child protection, equity and safety in that sport. Each year an annual audit of corporate governance is completed to determine whether the governing body continues to satisfy the criteria and may continue to receive public funding. That audit applies not only to the Amateur Rowing Association, but to all national governing bodies in receipt of public funds, including those with responsibility for swimming, athletics and sailing.

I have spoken about the Government's relationship to the sport's national governing bodies. It is also important to be clear about the role of the governing bodies. In this country, the governing bodies are responsible for all aspects of amateur sport. They set the rules and standards for their sport, and clubs that meet those standards can become affiliated to the governing body. One advantage of affiliation is the ability to compete in recognised national and international competitions. If a club fails to meet safety standards or does not have child protection or equity polices in place, it runs the risk of losing its status as an affiliated club.

We must recognise that many sports are supported by volunteers, and that the governing bodies themselves often do not have the resources to police all the activities of every club throughout the country. It is therefore important to note that sports clubs themselves are also responsible for ensuring that safety is at the top of their agenda, and that everyone involved is well aware of the risks and how best to manage them.

I now turn to the terrible tragedy of December 2000, when Leo Blockley lost his life in the accident in Spain. First, it is important to note that water sports inevitably carry more risks than many land-based ones. Rowers are dependent on the stability and safety of their boats, their own skill and ability in the water and those rowing alongside them, and the weather can have a devastating impact.

However, before I turn to the terrible incident that led to the death of Leo Blockley, it is important to recognise that rowing in Britain is, for the vast majority of rowers at amateur and professional level, a very safe sport indeed. I am sure that no one in the House or in the sport would want the terrible events of 2000 to stop young people enjoying rowing or other water sports. Not only do those sports offer great fun for people of all ages, they are sports at which we excel on the international stage.

I do not want to comment specifically on the events themselves. It is right and proper that they are investigated in an inquest, and it would be inappropriate for me to open up all that today. There have been two coroner's inquests since 2000. The second, in March 2005, overturned the verdict of the initial inquest, and ruled that Leo's death was accidental. The outcome of the second inquest was a rule 43 letter, as explained by my hon. Friend, to the Amateur Rowing Association.

I understand that a rule 43 letter arises when any coroner believes that action should be taken to prevent the recurrence of a fatality in similar circumstances. The coroner can then write to the person or authority that may have the power to take such action. In this case, the rule 43 letter contains 10 suggestions relating to the safety of the sport. Although the coroner has no power to order, instruct or require a recipient to take any action, we would all expect any observations to be taken extremely seriously and to be responded to in full.

From the discussion today and the correspondence that I have read in preparing for the debate, I know that there is some disagreement about the robustness of the Amateur Rowing Association's water safety code. In particular, there is a difference of views about boat buoyancy and the comparative strengths of the water safety code and the guidelines set by FISA, the international governing body for rowing.

On the issue of boat buoyancy, the Amateur Rowing Association believes that its safety standards exceed those of FISA. I know that Mr. and Mrs. Blockley take a different view. I understand that the Amateur Rowing Association wrote to the coroner to say that its water safety code is one of the most comprehensive safety codes in the world. From the papers I have read, I note that the code has been used by other national federations as the basis for developing their water safety policies. I am also aware that the 1994 code was used by FISA as the basis for its first ever safety guidance document.

In addition, the Amateur Rowing Association was the first federation in the world to adopt a buoyancy rule, which applies in and out of competition. As I understand it, FISA has set voluntary guidelines for national governing bodies to follow, but they are not mandatory. That appears to be quite different to the Amateur Rowing Association's position.

David Heyes: On that specific point, my hon. Friend acknowledges that there is a clear difference of opinion between the ARA and the Blockleys. I have said that the Blockleys have a huge raft of evidence that would warrant consideration by the Minister and his colleagues. I remind the Minister of my request for a meeting at which we can have a much broader discussion than is possible this afternoon.

Mr. Lammy: I take all that my hon. Friend has said very seriously. I note that the Blockley family have disputed the issue; they believe that the FISA guidelines are superior to the Amateur Rowing Association's code, particularly in the areas of heel restraints, cold water rowing, hot weather guidelines and, crucially, boat buoyancy. I totally accept that.

I am aware that the Amateur Rowing Association consulted widely when it was developing the code. It took account of the view of organisations such as the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents and the National Water Safety Forum. The code is also shared with a wide range of associated organisations, such as the Environment Agency, British Waterways and the Port of London authority.

My hon. Friend will recognise when presented with that information that the Amateur Rowing Association takes safety very seriously and involves a number of stakeholders. However, that said, it does mean perhaps that more could and should be done. We all agree that safety is paramount in any sport. The Amateur Rowing Association must continue to do all it can to promote its rules to all members and to the clubs that are involved. It should do all it can to ensure that safety is at the top of its list when training, competing or simply having fun in the water.

I recognise that after any tragic event, serious questions have to be asked of those involved in the accident, including the club that organised the trip. That was the purpose of the coroner's report. I share my hon. Friend's wish to see the matter resolved fairly for the Blockley family and the Amateur Rowing Association. For that reason, the Minister for Sport has agreed to meet my hon. Friend and the family and to hear their concerns. In addition, to attempt to resolve this important issue for all the parties involved, I will ask the Minister for Sport to write to the Amateur Rowing Association to clarify the matter of boat buoyancy and FISA's position. I will also request that he write to FISA to understand better its position and to Sport England to ask it to identify an appropriate organisation to undertake an independent assessment of the issues discussed today that are under dispute, including that of boat buoyancy.

I hope that, in that small way, my Department can help to resolve this very difficult and sad case. Nobody wants such a tragic accident to happen again. Thankfully, as I have said, such cases are rare. I hope that the debate will have reiterated the importance of safety in all sport, not just rowing. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the opportunity to talk through the issues in detail today.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Kevin Brennan.]

2.30 pm

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): It is a pleasure to open this debate on the most recent report of the Quadripartite Committee, the Government's response to that report, and the minutes of a meeting that the Committee held at the end of January.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.45 pm

On resuming—

Roger Berry: The Quadripartite Committee is an interesting creature. As Members will be aware, it is a Joint Committee involving the Trade and Industry, Foreign Affairs, International Development and Defence Committees, all of which have an interest in arms export control policy and want to scrutinise what the Government do in that area. Many years ago, we agreed to come together as one.

I thank my colleagues on the Committee for producing a unanimous report yet again. Although most Select Committees deliver unanimous reports, there are difficulties occasionally. However, we four Select Committees have delivered unanimity. I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge that that increases substantially the weight and validity of our conclusions.

Thanks must go to our Clerks for the excellent drafting. When the report before the House was drafted, the Clerk was Steven Mark and I place on record our thanks to him. Since the general election, our Clerk has been Glenn McKee, and I place on record our gratitude for the work he is doing on our behalf.

I also thank those who have given evidence to the Quadripartite Committee, such as the representatives from EGAD—the Export Group for Aerospace and Defence—which represents the defence manufacturers. They gave us a wealth of advice and information on how the system works and have offered to give further evidence on their experience of the arms export control regime. I am sure that that will give us further insight into how the system operates.

Non-governmental organisations are very active under the UK Working Group on Arms, which comprises Amnesty International, the British American Security Information Council—or BASIC—Christian Aid, Oxfam, Save the World and International Alert. The last time we took evidence, the journalist and broadcaster Mark Thomas also contributed. Like that of the defence manufacturers, the input of the non-governmental organisations has been invaluable, and I express the Committee's gratitude for their written and oral evidence.

I also thank the Foreign Secretary, who always willingly gives evidence to the Committee, and earlier this week the Minister for Energy, who has responsibility for the Export Control Organisation, kindly gave evidence. We are grateful for that too.

There is widespread acknowledgement that in recent years the Government have made great progress in developing an effective and transparent arms export control policy. That is illustrated by the opening few sentences of the written submission to the Quadripartite Committee by the UK Working Group on Arms:

"In recent years the UK Government has taken a strong lead on arms export controls at national, regional and international levels. As well as overhauling the national export control regime, the Government was instrumental in establishing the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports ... the world's first regional politically-binding agreement to control the transfer of conventional arms. In the last year, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been actively promoting a legally-binding global Arms Trade Treaty to control international arms transfers."

I would add that there has been the ban on the export of torture equipment as well as the Landmines Act 1998 and annual—now quarterly—reports giving details of licences granted. In sum, we have greater transparency and accountability than ever.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Quadripartite Committee report is excellent, and my hon. Friend rightly points to our Government's progress on arms export control. However, in paragraph 17 on page 55 of the report, the Committee reveals its dismay at the "resource cuts at the Export Control Organisation", and paragraph 20 on the same page states:

"It is unfortunate that the export control system ... is suffering cutbacks."

Does my hon. Friend not agree that it could, and would, be better funded if we got rid of the Defence Export Services Organisation, which provides 500 expensive civil servants freely to arms companies and is, in effect, a gratis marketing department for them? Does the fact that the long-suffering taxpayer gives them such a generous boost not stand oddly with arms control?

Roger Berry: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. On the ECO, may I simply say that not only the Quadripartite Committee but the NGOs and the defence manufacturers have expressed concerns about significant cuts in staffing? There is a worry about maintaining the effective scrutiny of licences with significantly fewer pairs of hands. As he acknowledges, the Committee, the defence manufacturers and the NGOs have loudly expressed their concerns about that. No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will comment on staffing matters in his winding-up speech.

My list of things that have made enormous improvements contains the Export Control Act 2002, which was the result of the first comprehensive review of export control legislation in this field for 60 years. I just remind hon. Members of that. In a moment, I shall identify one or two areas where I am unhappy that the Act did not go far enough, but I wish to place the achievements on record because they are not generally acknowledged.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) mentioned, the Committee raised a number of concerns—for example, the fact that the brokering controls have limited extraterritoriality and that offshore production can provide a way around UK arms export controls. The real issues are monitoring and enforcement.

Before I address those policy areas, I shall say a few words about the role and work of the Quad. Scrutiny is what Select Committees are all about and it is what this Committee seeks to undertake. In so doing, it aims to provide a catalyst for a wider debate about arms export control policy in the UK from which policy makers, defence manufacturers, NGOs and wider society benefit.

I am delighted that the Government's response states on page 2:

"The Government welcomes the high level scrutiny the Committee has applied in the area of strategic export controls. We are committed to ensuring our export licensing system remains one of the most effective and transparent in the world. We greatly value our dialogue with the Committee, and believe that its constructive criticism has helped the United Kingdom achieve this position."

I am grateful for the Government's comments. I therefore find it difficult to understand why their response also raises this issue: because we ask a lot of questions, it costs the Government a lot of money to reply. The next paragraph on page 2 states:

"The Government would like the new Committee to be aware that its necessary duties add significantly to the running costs of the Government's export controls. The staff time involved in answering the Committee's requests is quite significant. The Government hopes that the new Committee will try to balance these costs with the level of scrutiny that it feels is necessary".

Hon. Members will be pleased to hear that that should be my final quote—the Government certainly will be.

I have served on Select Committees in the House for the past 14 years. I can recall no other Select Committee ever being advised by a Department, let alone by four Departments, to be careful about how many questions it asks because it is difficult to find the pairs of hands to answer them. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire has pointed out, given that the Department that has found it quite easy—

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Roger Berry: I shall, so that my hon. Friend can make the point.

David Taylor: I endorse my hon. Friend's comment, which underlines what I said at the start: if we as a Government, and the taxpayers at large, are being asked to fund 500 civil servants in the Ministry of Defence—in DESO—to promote the very arms sales that another arm of Government is trying to ensure are going to appropriate regimes, it defies belief that the comment in the Government response should be expressed in these terms. It does not add up at all.

Roger Berry: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. My point is even more basic: to the best of my knowledge, no other Select Committee—hon. and right hon. Members will correct me if I am wrong—has been told, "Please be careful how many questions you ask because of the resource implications of answering them."

The ECO, to which we direct most of our questions, recently reduced staffing by about a third over two years. As a group of four Select Committees, we have a unique scrutiny function. Our work involves examining Government policies and analysing issues that arise from them. The end product of the controls system is thousands of individual licensing decisions, each of which could be very important. It is no great secret that we test only a small proportion of those because we do not have the resources to do more, dearly though I wish we had. Digging into the detail is part of our job. It is no more cost-neutral than the work of any other Select Committee. With the greatest respect, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government to stop complaining about answering our questions when, on the other hand, they welcome our "high level scrutiny".

I shall move on to one of the key policy issues relating to trafficking and brokering. I mentioned that one of the great achievements in recent years was the 2002 Act. A major step forward in that Act was bringing trafficking and brokering under control to some degree. As the Committee and I see it, the problem is that the actions of UK citizens as traffickers and brokers are regulated abroad only if they are brokering long-range missiles—missiles that travel more than 300 m—torture equipment or trade to embargoed destinations.

UK citizens who broker deals from abroad in other areas are not covered. Therefore, missiles that travel for fewer than 300 m, man-portable air defence systems, small arms and rocket-propelled grenades are not covered. Automatic light weapons—the small arms that are used in so many areas of conflict in the world—are not covered by the extraterritoriality provisions of the 2002 Act. That is a major mistake. Every minute, a man, woman or child on this planet is killed as a result of the use of weapons. Some 500,000 people a year die from the use of small arms. UK citizens who broker small arms from outside the UK are free to go about their work without seeking any licence whatever from the UK Government.

Small arms are the current weapons of mass destruction on our planet. When the Government review the 2002 Act, as they will next year, I hope they pay due attention to extending to brokering and trafficking full extraterritorial controls, so that those parts of the arms trade that are subject to control are comprehensive. There should not be partial controls such as the ones that we have on long-range missiles, torture equipment and embargoed destinations.

The 2002 Act was a missed opportunity. It could have been a comprehensive regulation, but it was not. As the Committee has pointed out on more than one occasion, that was particularly disappointing because the Government's 2001 general election manifesto commitment was clear. I promise that this will be my final quote:

> "We will legislate to modernise the regulation of arms exports, with a licensing system to control the activities of arms brokers and traffickers wherever they are located."

The Government have done a fantastic job on this issue compared with the previous Government, so it pains me to say that there is only one way that that manifesto commitment can be understood. Sadly, the Government have yet to live up to it.

I ask the Minister for an assurance that when the 2002 Act is reviewed next year, the full extension of extraterritoriality will be considered. I am confident that our Committee will make a robust case in support of that position, and I hope it will be seriously considered.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is making a compelling case. I and a number of other Members are desperately worried about cluster munitions. I am of the view that they should be banned outright, and that they are no different from land mines, but I know that the Government have a different view. That is an area where there is a need for robust controls. In this regard, the relationship with the European Union is interesting, and Belgium has announced that it intends to ban the use of cluster munitions. It would pain me to know that our country was in any way responsible for the export of such munitions.

Will my hon. Friend use that as an example—next year perhaps—to look at what this country does? We signed up to the Ottawa convention on land mines. Does he agree that we should be following that through by at least ensuring that we do not export weapons of terrible cruelty that we could do something to control?

Roger Berry: I have a great deal of sympathy with the point my hon. Friend makes, but the question should be directed to the Minister, in respect of Government policy on this matter. If the Chamber does not receive an entirely satisfactory answer this afternoon, the Quadripartite Committee will certainly look into it.

On brokering, may I mention an experience that I and some others had on a recent evening when we met a group of students from Lord Williams's upper school in Oxford? I had previously visited the school, because some of its students are engaged in a project on the arms trade, and they interrogated me. They then sat in on the last sitting of the Quadripartite Committee, and a few of us had the pleasure of meeting them outside the Palace of Westminster on Monday afternoon.

Those students have, via the internet, been able to set themselves up as arms brokers. They have managed to secure thumb cuffs, wall cuffs and a sting stick. For Members who are not familiar with these matters, a sting stick is about 2 ft long and made of stainless steel, and it has what look like nails sticking out of it. It is a ferocious thing. If people started hitting others with a sting stick, they would quickly recognise what an instrument of torture is.

Those school students were able, via the internet, to set themselves up as a brokering company and obtain those three items. Interestingly, none of those items falls within the list of items of torture equipment. The Government rightly banned the export of torture equipment very soon after they were first elected—in 1997, I believe. A list was announced in the House of items that the Government regarded as instruments of torture, such as stun guns and large handcuffs. That the three items the students secured are not on that list is one issue. Another is that people can simply log on to the internet, create a website and broker such items.

As I knew that the students had invited me and my colleagues along to see those thumb cuffs, the wall cuffs and the sting stick, being a good law-abiding citizen I sought advice from the police. Interestingly, I was told that under no circumstances should the sting stick be removed from its secure case on College green. It is a delightful paradox that school students can buy such items over the internet, having established themselves as brokers, and that they are not breaking the law. No law was broken. The law would have been broken if the students had opened the box and shown me the sting stick. The students did not open the box, but I saw the sting stick. This situation is very weird.

In relation to brokering, the first conclusion should be that we must have a register of brokers. The Department of Trade and Industry's ECO does a lot of outreach work; it goes around telling companies and business people how to comply with legislation. That work is important and I am not mocking it—on the contrary—but if we want to control what brokers do, I suggest that we need to do rather more than offer a few outreach courses. The way to know who those people are is to require them to register. Therefore, I think a register would be appropriate.

It is odd that the nasty things that some of us saw on Monday evening can be obtained by brokering on the internet, but that the police would immediately arrest anyone who had such a thing in their possession. Can we not sort out the brokering controls? In particular, there needs to be a way to update the list on torture equipment, or to have a catch-all provision. Do the Government have plans to update the list of items that are restricted by virtue of being torture equipment? Will they propose a catch-all provision? Given that the European Union has been discussing the question of the control of the trade in torture equipment, can the Minister assure the House that the provisions that result from that will be at least as strict as the ones that most sensible people want in this country now?

I shall now discuss offshore production. It is a commonplace to observe that we live in a globalised world. One aspect of that is that UK companies, like those of other countries, are increasingly involved in arms production in other nations. That takes place in various ways, such as through joint ventures, where part of the production takes place in another country, as well as subsidiaries and licensed production. Currently, those activities take place outside UK arms export controls. Without wishing to accuse every arms manufacturer of seeking to avoid arms export controls, it is clear that if the UK has stringent controls—as it does—there is an incentive for them to carry out the relevant bit of the production overseas.

Members may recall the Andijan massacre in Uzbekistan in May last year. Land Rover Defender military vehicles were used by Uzbek troops during that massacre. The Committee raised that with the Government; we wondered where those vehicles came from. The Government's response was that Land Rover in the UK exports flat-pack civilian Land Rover Defenders to a Turkish company, Octar, which assembles them and adds its own components to make a military vehicle. On the basis of the evidence we have received, it appears that such vehicles were given to Uzbekistan by the Turkish Government, and were used in the Andijan massacre.

The Government are rightly committed not to export arms to countries or individuals who might use them to abuse human rights. Therefore, the relevance of this case is perfectly clear. The Government have informed the Committee that the UK has no power to control the export of civilian specification Land Rovers. Oxfam has informed us—back to the websites again, I am afraid—that Octar's website shows that it manufactures Land Rover Defenders under Land Rover licence.

The Committee has been given photographs, which we have passed to the relevant Minister, showing Land Rover and Octar jointly displaying at the Defence Systems and Equipment International, or DSEI, arms fair last year. I am sure that the enforcement authorities are looking into the connections between Land Rover UK and Octar, but whatever they are the issue is very simple. Anyone vaguely familiar with the arms trade knows perfectly well that exported civilian vehicles can often be transformed into military vehicles without an enormous effort—10 per cent. more production will turn them into military vehicles.

It is self-evident, therefore, that if we are concerned about where vehicles end up, we should be asking questions of those who export from the UK to areas where vehicles might be so transformed. However, there is no such control. On the other hand, had an application been made for a licence to export vehicles from the UK to Uzbekistan, I am quite confident that ECO would have refused it. We now have a European Union embargo, so as of today a licence would not be granted. Somebody somewhere therefore acknowledges that this is a serious matter.

I make no allegations about Land Rover, and I have no idea how much it knows or what websites it checks out, but I simply make the point to the Minister, and to the Government more generally, that this example shows how UK arms export controls can be bypassed. The conclusion I draw is that licensed production arrangements should contain specific re-export clauses to prevent exports to destinations of concern. If we do not have such clauses, our export controls will be severely limited in an increasingly globalised world.

Let me briefly give one further example. I happened to be in Chennai, in India, last week with the Trade and Industry Committee. By chance, the Committee Chair arranged for us to go to Ashok Leyland, where we were told that the company exports military vehicles to Africa. It said that it had wanted to sell to another country but was not allowed to do so. When I asked, the company confirmed my suspicion that that country was Sudan, which is, of course, subject to an EU embargo.

The Committee was advised that Ashok Leyland was prevented from exporting to Sudan because the company is 51 per cent. UK owned—it is, of course, part of the Hinduja group. The good news here is that the extraterritorial controls in the 2002 Act apply because Sudan is an EU embargo destination and a UK citizen or two is involved in the company. However, if Ashok Leyland India had, for example, wanted to sell armoured vehicles to a country that was not subject to an embargo, the UK would have had no control over the sale whatever, despite the fact that the company is 51 per cent. UK owned and a UK citizen or two has, I understand, a very direct link with it. So, the good news is that the 2002 Act worked and prevented that specific export to Sudan—indeed, I congratulate the Government on that—but I am worried about the loophole in relation to other destinations.

I know that my colleagues want to contribute, so the final issue that I want to mention is the enforcement of arms export legislation. Clearly, the first thing that we need to do is to get the legislation right. The second is to ensure that we have proper enforcement, and the Committee hopes to take further evidence on the issue from Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, which is responsible for policing and enforcing the legislation.

When it comes to the enforcement of arms sales legislation, the only thing that matters—it is not simply the most important thing—is end use. As the arms to Iraq scandal taught us, what matters is who gets the arms and what they do with them. The licence application might have said that the weapons were going to Jordan, but they ended up in Iraq. At the time of the Iran-Iraq war, the Trade and Industry Committee looked at how Iran got weapons. The export licence might have said Singapore, but it really meant Iran. All that matters, therefore, is that we have total confidence that the end-use information on our export licence applications is accurate and—because that is not enough—that we check that information.

There is no point the DTI ticking the box and saying, "They say this is going to our friendly neighbour Austria," or, "This is going to our dear old friend Singapore." From some statistics, it seems that Singapore has the largest navy, air force and army in the world. We must ensure that there is a degree of end-use monitoring to check that arms end up where they are supposed to—in safe hands, not the wrong places. I simply urge the Minister to give us some information on how the Government go about end-use monitoring.

David Taylor: When the Minister answers that question, will he also reply to my point about the future of DESO? It is not only inconsistent, but illogical and immoral, that an arm of the Government is working in parallel, and indeed in conflict, with the ECO, not least because it need have no regard to whether there are continuing conflicts, human rights abuses or pressing development needs in certain countries—its only objective is to maximise profits for arms companies. Is that not a disgrace? Should it not be shut down?

Roger Berry: I am again grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. Cleary, the question is aimed at the Minister, and I look forward to the reply.

I would like an assurance from the Minister that every effort will be made to ensure that we have an effective system of end-use monitoring. As I said, end use is the only thing that matters in relation to the arms trade. There are, however, other enforcement issues. As we all know, the brokering of torture equipment is, thankfully, prohibited under the 2002 Act, but the Committee received evidence that TAR Ideal, an Israeli company, was openly advertising electroshock batons and leg irons in its brochures at last year's DSEI arms fair in London. Those items are specifically restricted under Government policy on torture equipment.

Although the company was asked to leave the arms fair when its activities were exposed, it was not our enforcement authorities who exposed them, but Mark Thomas. To take another example, Mr. Thomas gave evidence that Global Armour, a South African company, was offering electroshock weapons in its brochures at the same event. Although ECO has produced guidance on arms fairs, I would be grateful if the Minister told me what enforcement measures are used in relation to such events. My understanding is that brochures had to be submitted and that somebody somewhere was supposed to check them. Why was it left to an investigative journalist to spot a breach in UK law?

My general point is that I want to be reassured that the Government are putting enough resources into enforcing arms control legislation. When we tell people, "It's a legal requirement that you have a television licence," it is a bit like saying, "It's a requirement that you have a licence to export arms," except that it is not quite as serious. However, when we tell people, "You must have a TV licence," we do not say, "Oh, that's fine—heigh ho. We'll wait until Mark Thomas pops round and discovers that you don't have one."

We have vehicles going up and down the roads, streets and avenues checking that people have a TV licence and that all is well. All I ask is that the Government pay similar attention to the enforcement of the requirement to have a licence to trade in arms as they do to the requirement to have a licence to watch TV, get married or hold a raffle. I do not think that that is unreasonable, although I have put it in a slightly light-hearted way.

I have tried to find out how many people are employed at Revenue and Customs to enforce the legislation, but I am afraid that I received an answer to a parliamentary question along the lines of, "I'm afraid we cannot work this out, because obviously people are multi-tasked. People are doing different things." It must be possible to find a full-time equivalent number. I cannot believe that it is that difficult, although if it takes a long time for the Government to reply I would hate resources to be taken away from the business of controlling the export of arms. In all seriousness, I just want reassurance that such enforcement issues are being dealt with seriously. Our Committee, the NGOs and the defence manufacturers have all raised those issues.

There is one other issue: the international arms trade treaty. I welcomed earlier the fact that within 12 months of the launch by Oxfam, Amnesty and others of a campaign for an international arms trade treaty, the Secretary of State announced, in September 2004, that the UK Government were committed to that. I have referred to several instances of what I regard as loopholes in the arms export control regime, and of course one key loophole is the possibility of simply getting on a train and going somewhere else to do business. The case for an international arms trade treaty is the attempt to secure international agreement to control the arms trade. It is a difficult task, but there is a clear logic to it.

Again, I welcome the fact that the Government have been leading in that field. The Quadripartite Committee strongly supports an international arms trade treaty, as our report states. I would be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister said a little about what progress has been made. I gather that about 40 countries are involved, which is probably double the number of a year ago, so I know that the Government have made progress, but I would be grateful for clarification.

I would also like some comment on whether we are likely to be at the lowest-common-denominator end of aspirations as to what the treaty might include, or nearer the UK, and indeed US, end of controls. I would appreciate any comment on how the treaty would be policed, and the Minister might want to advise us on how the emerging arms manufacturers—such as India, China, Malaysia, Brazil, South Africa and Chile—feel about signing up for an international arms trade treaty. It is important that they come along.

My final point was to be about staffing in ECO and Revenue and Customs, but I think that that has been covered, thanks to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire. This is a serious matter. Key decisions are being made, and I admire the work that people are doing, which is very important. ECO has a very difficult, arduous and important job to do and I reiterate my gratitude for all that it does, but it must have the resources to ensure that it can scrutinise licences properly.

There is a fear, which I hope the Minister will say is unfounded, that there are now more open licences, because of the pressure that results from having fewer staff. If that were true, it would be a weakening of our licensing system. I want, first, assurances that resources are available for ECO effectively to consider licence applications. Secondly, I want assurances that Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, which has a policing and enforcement function, has the resources to carry it out.

The Government have made enormous progress. The Committee has acknowledged that, as have the NGOs. What I have outlined are some concerns that remain, and I very much hope that when we review the 2002 Act next year, the Government allow us sufficient time and information to do a proper job so as to ensure that what many of us consider loopholes in the legislation can be plugged as quickly as possible.

3.25 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): I am very pleased to follow the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), who was an excellent Chairman of the Quadripartite Committee in the previous Parliament and deservedly was unanimously reappointed in the new one. We very much welcome that.

I want to follow the hon. Gentleman on one issue—trafficking and brokering. If I touch on some of the same points that he did, it will at least bring home to the Minister the fact that on this issue the all-party Quadripartite Committee is in absolute all-party agreement on the Government's current policy shortcomings. Before I come to those points, I want to spell out the ambit of the current legal provisions that underpin the Government's policy.[5] I do so because finding one's way through the maze of statutory instruments to get at the Government's policy is not at all easy and it is important to pay close attention to where the current wording is found.

In brief, non-legal terms, the Government have confined the creation of a criminal offence of trafficking and brokering to two categories. The first is missiles of a range of 300 km. I believe that the hon. Member for Kingswood twice referred to a distance of 300 m. If that were correct we should largely have achieved our policy objective.

Roger Berry: I am so grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, and even more so for correcting that glaring error. I really appreciate it; I am humbled.

Sir John Stanley: The items concerned are missiles with a range of 300 km and more, and torture equipment. The answer to the question of how trafficking and brokering are defined is that they are not defined in the legislation at all. They are instead defined by particular types of transactions taking place in particular places. The details are to be found in article 3(2) of the Trade in Goods (Control) Order 2003. That is the ambit of what in broad terms we call trafficking and brokering, but the legislation provides no such definition. It defines the activities simply by categories of transaction.

As to the particular designation of the items that are caught, those are found in two separate places. The missiles are defined in the schedule to the order to which I have referred, under the heading "Certain Missiles", as:

"Missiles capable of a range of 300km or more, and specially designed components therefor".

The pointer to where to find the other items, the so-called torture equipment—and again torture is not defined anywhere—first appears in the same schedule, under the heading "Certain Security and Para-Military Police Equipment". The reader is then referred to:

"Any good falling within paragraph c. or g. of PL5001 in Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods, Transfer of Technology and Provision of Technical Assistance (Control) Order 2003."

It may be helpful, certainly to me, to turn to that order—statutory instrument No. 2764 of 2003—in which PL5001 in schedule 1 is headed "Other security and para-military police 'goods', as follows".

Torture equipment is specified in paragraph c, which states:

"Restraints specially designed for restraining human beings, as follows:

1. Leg-irons;
2. Gangchains;
3. Electric-shock belts;
4. Individual cuffs".

Details of their dimensions are then given. Paragraphs c5 and c6 list various types of shackles, and paragraph g refers to:

"Portable devices designed or modified for the purpose of riot control or self-protection by the administration of an electric shock (e.g., electric-shock batons, electric-shock shields, stun-guns and electric-shock dart-guns (tasers)) and components therefor specially designed or modified for such a purpose."

I wanted to read out those details because they support and illustrate a point that the hon. Member for Kingswood made and that I also wish to come to.

On policy, in the extensive evidence that we took from the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, now the Secretary of State for Health, I never understood why she took the groundbreaking step of extending extraterritoriality and accepting the principle of doing so, but then made such a mess of implementing the statutory instrument. Why was it necessary to accept the principle and then entirely miss the main weapons and equipment that are the subject of trafficking and brokering? To this day, I have not understood why she adopted the policy that she did and then walked—very predictably—into strong criticism from our Committee and outside organisations, such as NGOs and now even the Defence Manufacturers Association. Indeed, in the latest evidence that it gave the Committee, the association recognised that the current policy does not make much sense to its members as legal, legitimate sellers of arms of one sort or another. They are carrying out legitimate business, but are in danger of having their entire industry tainted by the activities of those acting outside the law.

Whatever the reasons for the Government arriving at the current, pretty ludicrous policy, it does not stack up. Let us first take missiles. I am not aware of any UK person being involved outside the UK in the trafficking or brokering of missiles of a range of 300 km or more. If someone has done so, they have kept it quiet, but I fancy that it would have come into the public domain long before now. I am not advocating removing that category of weapon, but the likelihood of such a thing happening is very small indeed, and I am not aware of any such case. However, I stress that I do not want that category removed.

The issue is different with torture equipment. I have sympathy with the Government and acknowledge the difficulties. It is impossible in reality to produce a list of every item that could conceivably be used for the purposes of torture. I acknowledge that straight away, and I note that the Minister is nodding. The Government have done their best; they could probably widen the list somewhat further, but they have come up with a reasonable first stab. However, it is illusory to imagine that it will ever be possible to come up with a comprehensive list of items that could be used to inflict pain.

The hon. Member for Kingswood referred to the items that had been brought to him by students. Indeed, one of the witnesses who came before our Committee just a few months ago illustrated his point by bringing a pair of thumb cuffs, with extremely nasty serrated edges. They were passed round for the members to have a look at and see for themselves the kind of items that are readily available but not within the ambit of the statutory instrument to which I have drawn attention.

I acknowledge that the issue of torture equipment is difficult, but the key failure is that the overwhelming bulk of trafficking and brokering is of items that are completely outside the ambit of the legislation that the Government have introduced. Those items are small arms, light weapons, automatic weapons and weapons that are man portable—man portable missiles and man portable rockets. Such items are overwhelmingly the subject of this extremely dangerous trade, but there is no mention of them whatever in the secondary legislation. I remind the Minister of how relatively easy it is for traffickers and brokers to get such weapons, making them available in areas of conflict, where they could conceivably be used against our own forces and against innocent civilians all around the world.

An absolutely outstanding piece of investigative journalism was published on the front page of The Sunday Times on 8 May 2005, under the heading "Radiation rockets on sale to 'terrorists'". I do not want to gloss the piece; I shall read out just the opening sentences, because they indicate in a compelling way how the existing legislation is so inadequate:

"Three radioactive rockets capable of contaminating a city centre were offered for sale last week to a Sunday Times reporter posing as a middleman for Islamic terrorists.

The Alazan rockets, which have a range of eight miles, were among 50,000 tons of weapons left behind at an arms dump in the breakaway eastern European republic of Transdniester"—

that is part of Moldova—

"when the Russian army withdrew after the cold war.

They were offered to the reporter for $500,000 ... after he approached a senior officer in Transdniester's secret police, claiming to represent a militant group in Algeria. The officer contacted a local arms dealer who arranged meetings with the reporter on a bridge in Transdniester and later at a hotel in neighbouring Moldova.

At their first meeting two months ago, the dealer said the price of a single rocket would be $200,000."

As an indication that the people in the business are providing guarantees of death with their items, the article continued:

"The rocket could be independently inspected with a Geiger counter to verify that its warhead contained radioactive strontium and caesium".

That story has been wholly corroborated. The Quadripartite Committee pursued it with the Government, and asked them to respond to the report. I felt that their reply was completely unsatisfactory. It began:

"We are concerned by reports of illicit arms sales involving Transdniester", and went on to make comments about trying to tighten up the border between Moldova and Transdniester. I put it to the Minister that, given that we have evidence of how easy it is to get hold of radiation rockets with a huge capacity to inflict death and long-term radiation sickness, to state:

"We are concerned by reports of illicit arms sales involving Transdniester" seems a grossly mild response.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): May I add to what the right hon. Gentleman is saying? In 2007 or 2008, the borders of the European Union will include the border between Romania and Moldova. We have interesting questions to ask about what will be happening in an EU neighbour region—it is not the only one—in terms of the possible transfer of such weapons within and around the European Union.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He makes an important point to which I am sure the Minister will pay close attention.

On policy, I come to the Quadripartite Committee's recommendations. Our central recommendation, which is exactly the same in this Parliament as it has been previously, is worth reading out. It features in paragraph 156 of our report, which reads:

"The Committees recommended last year that 'the Government should reconsider which types of trafficking and brokering activity it subjects to extra-territorial control to identify more accurately those which are of most pressing and genuine concern—in particular those weapons most likely to be used by terrorists or in civil wars. We recommend that trade in such weapons, including MANPADS, rocket-propelled grenades and automatic light weapons, should be subject to extra-territorial control where they are intended for end use by anyone other than a national government or its agent, and where the country from which the trade is being conducted or from which the export will take place does not itself have adequate trade or export controls consistent with the British Government's policy on arms exports.' We make the same recommendation in this Report."

There was a consistent expression of policy from the Quadripartite Committee in the last Parliament, and it is being reiterated in this Parliament. I put it to the Minister that there can surely be no objection any longer on the principle of extraterritoriality as far as certain categories of criminal offence are concerned. We have accepted—there is all-party agreement in all these areas—extraterritorial criminal legislation on terrorism, serious organised crime and sexual offences against children overseas. In all those areas, rightly, extraterritoriality has been accepted. I urge the Government most strongly to fill in the glaring gap on trafficking and brokering, and to make certain that all the main categories of weapon that are trafficked and brokered fall within the extraterritoriality provisions of this Parliament.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): I should like to begin by taking up the point that my friend and colleague on the Foreign Affairs Committee, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley), has raised.

The Government made it clear as recently as earlier this week that the regulations that apply to UK companies do not extend to subsidiaries of UK companies in other countries; they are not monitored or checked with regard to arms exports. That is what we were told by the Department of Trade and Industry, and it prompts a further question. What happens, as the Chairman of our Quadripartite Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), asked, when companies have subsidiaries in other parts of the world? We need to look at such matters in detail over the coming months.

Today, I want to focus on two areas that have not really been covered. One was touched on by my hon. Friend when he referred to the arms trade treaty. I should be interested to know from the Minister where we are on this year's negotiations for an international arms trade treaty to deal with the small arms that were referred to. As I understand it, discussions are going on in Vienna and elsewhere on such matters, and there was an intention, or at least a hope, that there would be some kind of breakthrough at the United Nations General Assembly later this year. Where are we in that process, which countries have so far signed up and what problems are there in relation to some of the world's major arms exporters?

[Mike Gapes]

It is excellent news that our Government are among the 40 and that many members of this House and others in this country have signed up to support the arms trade treaty.

Mike Gapes: I am grateful to have the opportunity to continue my speech, although for how long I am not sure. I was talking about the negotiations on the international arms trade treaty. As I understand it, there is the prospect of some progress this year. The hope is that 2006 will be the time when we get such a treaty.

Mike Gapes: The second major area that I want to speak about is the debate about the possible lifting of the European Union's arms embargo on China. In February 2004, the Foreign Secretary told the Quadripartite Committee that the Government were reviewing that policy. The European Union has been engaged in an interesting process over the past two years. There has been considerable pressure from some member states to lift the embargo on China. As a result of hostile reaction from many parliamentarians, including many European parliamentarians, not least the unanimous view of the Quadripartite Committee in two reports—one in 2004 and the other in 2005—a large vote of 411 to 3 in the United States House of Representatives and other representations, there seem to have been second thoughts. I want to go into that in detail because it goes to the heart of one of our difficulties in having international controls over arms exports.

The European Union introduced its embargo on arms to China for good reasons following the massacre of peaceful demonstrators in Tiananmen square in 1989. Our Committee took the view that it was wrong to lift the embargo on China because the Committee's opinion in 2004 and again in 2005 was that the human rights situation in China had not improved sufficiently to reward it by lifting the embargo. At the same time, the opening up of China to the rest of the world, its 9 or 10 per cent. per annum sustained economic growth over 15 years and the fact that it has become the world manufacturing centre for toys, clothes and, increasingly, various kinds of electrical and manufactured products means that it is an important and growing part of the global economy.

Clearly, the Chinese Government now have far more influence because of their economic weight in the world and are seeking to improve their performance, not just economically, and are undergoing significant modernisation of their armed forces. The Chinese People's Liberation Army, which was a huge part of the communist structure, is being reduced in size and made more professional with a huge high-tech equipment programme based on modern weaponry rather than Soviet Union discards, so that China can develop its potential for a blue water navy to protect its increasing imports of steel, oil, gas and other raw materials from the rest of the world as part of its massive manufacturing boom. That is all going ahead.

We were told repeatedly that the lifting of the arms embargo on China by the European Union would have no practical significance and that there would instead be a European Union code of conduct so that in practice nothing would change. That raises the question: why do something if nothing will change in practice? The reason is that although nothing might change for the United Kingdom because we have a strict interpretation of the embargo, that is not so for other European states. Our report states in paragraph 115:

"The UK is the only member state to have published its interpretation of the embargo. It covers 'lethal weapons such as machine guns, large calibre weapons, bombs, torpedoes, rockets and missiles; specially designed components of the above, and ammunition; military aircraft and helicopters, vessels of war, armoured fighting vehicles and other such weapons platforms; and any equipment which is likely to be used for internal repression.'"

At the time of our report, the UK was the only one of the 25 member states of the European Union to have published an interpretation of the embargo. I would be grateful if the Minister would correct me if that is wrong and if since then there have been fantastic floods of interpretations—if the French and German Governments have published detailed interpretations of what the arms embargo means—or if companies such as European Aerospace and Defence Systems, which is quoted in our evidence as being keen to export various kinds of naval and other equipment to China, have been influenced by the Governments in other EU states. I suspect not.

It is clear from press releases and reports of visits by senior German and French political figures to China that the opening up of that country is perceived not simply in terms of civil manufacturing output but also as a potential large-scale export market for high-tech equipment, which the Chinese People's Liberation Army and the Chinese Government wish to have.

The report was published in March 2005, just before the general election. I believe that, as part of our representations, it has had some influence. The EU Council of Ministers meeting in June 2005 took no decision on lifting the arms embargo, even though the previous autumn, in 2004, there had been a great deal of chatter about it happening. It did not happen, and if the British Government played a decisive role at the time in stopping a change, they should be praised. Perhaps the Minister can confirm whether that was the case.

No progress was made under the British presidency in the second half of 2005. The arms embargo on China was not even referred to in any of the communiqués at the end of it. That is very good, as far as I am concerned, and as the four Select Committees—Defence, International Development, Trade and Industry, and Foreign Affairs—agreed in the last Parliament.

When we published the report, I had just been in the United States with the Defence Committee. The Foreign Affairs Committee visited around the same time. We heard strong views from all the American politicians whom we met that, symbolically, lifting the arms embargo was significant not just in respect of human rights and the signals that it would send but because of the unresolved, potentially explosive conflict across the straits of Taiwan. For the United States, Japan and many other countries in that part of the world, anything that destabilises or raises the temperature in that region is not good news.

It is interesting that the Chinese National People's Congress passed what it called the anti-secessionist law in the first half of 2005. Basically, it states that a Taiwanese declaration of independence would be interpreted as an act of war. Clearly, that may have had some impact on concentrating minds in the Council of Ministers, but now things are even more serious. There has been some sabre-rattling and rhetorical hostility in recent months as a result of statements made by the Taiwanese and the recent closure of an office for relations between Taiwan and the mainland. I hope that that is not the precursor to a more difficult relationship in that region.

The Foreign Affairs Committee is considering these issues at present and we have already started to take evidence on China's role in the world, its relations with its neighbours, and its economic, political, military and strategic relationship with all its neighbours. I hope that that will better inform the input from the Foreign Affairs Committee to the next report of the Quadripartite Committee.

In the time that I have left, I would like to ask the Minister to clarify the current status of the EU arms embargo. Can he clarify the position of Her Majesty's Government on the differences between the impact on China of the arms embargo, which is accepted to be patchy, inconsistent and not generally applied in any way by the EU as a whole, and of the EU code of conduct for arms exports? If it is the case that there is no difference in practice from the UK Government's position, does that apply also in respect of the Governments of France, Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Spain, Portugal and all the other EU 25?

In addition, what representations have been received from Governments outside the EU about the possible political and diplomatic impact of lifting the arms embargo on China? In that context, are the British Government of the view that we should be relaxed about the changes that are taking place in the region, or do they believe that any lifting of the arms embargo on China is inevitably linked to the reasons that it was first introduced, which was to do with human rights and related issues in that country?

I know that the Minister, as the Minister with responsibility for human rights and as a Minister who has been to China, closely follows the situation in the region. This is not a debate about China, and I do not wish to shift it too much to the human rights aspects, but I ask those questions in the context of the report. The Foreign Affairs Committee was in the United States two weeks ago. We had some interesting discussions there about exactly these issues. I hope that we will be able to go into greater detail when we produce our reports later this year.

To conclude, I should like to touch on a related area that is mentioned in the report. What is the general policy in respect of countries that are coming out of embargoes? There is a small reference in the report to the situation in Libya, although we make no recommendations. In their response, the Government referred to a so-called toolbox for countries coming out of an embargo. Can we be told what has happened to the toolbox? Is it still a box and does it have any tools in it? I understand that it was still being developed at the time of the Government's response to our report, and I should be grateful to know what has happened.

It is clear that arms embargoes and their effectiveness are fundamental issues. The United Nations is discussing possible sanctions against Iran, and there are several other conflicts in the world. The Darfur region in Sudan is one where imports of weaponry into the region of conflict play an important part in the process. In the absence of an international arms trade treaty and strong regional security organisations—the African Union is a fledgling organisation that does not yet have real capabilities to enforce embargoes—it is clear that the European Union has a big role, NATO has a big role and we, as a permanent member of the UN Security Council, have a big role to ensure that we get effective measures in embargoes. When the political situation in the country changes—such as that of Colonel Gaddafi's regime, for example—and it decides to come back to the standards of the world by moving away from secretly developing chemical weapons and aspirations to build nuclear weapons, in order to engage with the rest of the world, embargoes and sanctions are lifted. We must be clear about the circumstances under which that happens. Embargoes should not be lifted too early or in the wrong way, and we need full compliance with the consequences of doing that.

That takes me to the other area I touched on during my earlier intervention: how one member country in the international system relates to other countries. Countries have borders, coastlines and beaches. It is easy to smuggle small arms from one country to another. It is especially easy where the writ of a central Government does not run: regions such as Waziristan in Pakistan, parts of Somalia, or the areas referred to earlier of the so-called frozen conflicts of the post-Soviet world, such as the Caucasus or Transnistria.

The arms brokers are based where central Government do not run, where there are lawless regimes, mafias or corrupt warlords: people who are not subject to international sanctions. The conflicts in Sierra Leone and Liberia were fuelled by people of South African, Russian, Ukrainian or Belarusian nationality, flying aircraft and arms into remote airstrips to arm insurgents to fuel conflicts that led to the deaths of many thousands and millions of refugees and displaced people. That is the reality of what we are dealing with.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling for quoting the various statutory instruments, sub-paragraphs and clauses, but the reality is that we are talking about effective measures to prevent loss of life, to prevent people from being driven from their homes, to stop suffering and to make the world a better place. If we do not have international institutions that can do that, those of us who have the democratic institutions must use whatever means we can in those institutions to make the world a better place. When he replies, I should be grateful if the Minister touches on at least some of those points.

4.33 pm

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): This is my first outing speaking on international issues for the Liberal Democrats and I shall try and win friends by being brief.

I must say something about the quality of this report. The Committee has produced an outstanding report that has stood the test of time. It was written in 2003, and if it had been written two weeks ago, it would have been viewed as insightful and topical. Perhaps that says something about the difficulty of making progress in this area, but it also says something about the Committee's ability to focus on priorities and major issues, and to tease out those subjects on which we need to focus. This debate has been a brilliant introduction to the subject and I much appreciate the comments and discussion.

I shall focus on a few areas about which I should like to make some statements and raise some questions. The issue of resources has been a thread that has run throughout the debate. One might say that the Gershon cuts were the latest round of retrenchment for the Export Control Organisation. The Government used the opportunity of their response to the Committee's report to say that they were keeping under review the potential privatisation of parts of the export licensing process. I understand that since that date, they have said that they do not intend to privatise part of that process. I can think of nothing more inappropriate and I wonder whether the Minister can give us some absolute clarity on that issue, so that we can understand whether the matter is under review or permanently off the table.

The issue of resources goes farther than that. We read testimony from officials essentially discounting suggestions that website monitoring should be an inherent part of the activity of the Export Control Organisation. I find that hard to believe. Perhaps the Minister will take back to the ECO the discussions we have had today and the reports of the ease with which teenagers have managed to acquire instruments of torture—in this case. I suspect they could have gone further, which would have been a far more shattering experience and not one that we want to know.

Times are changing. The role of the internet is changing and the way in which all kinds of purchases takes place is changing. I noted the testimony of Mr. Glyn Williams, director of the ECO, which was given last Monday. When these questions were asked of him, he said:

"We do not do detective work on a speculative basis."

After the testimony today, it is not speculative any more. Indeed, detective work has to be an inherent part of the monitoring and enforcement process, so I hope that that will be taken on board.

The checking of subsidiaries' activities seems fairly fundamental. It is a line of direction that should be at the centre of ECO activity, rather than considered peripheral or extraneous to it. The hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) suggested the registering of brokers, which is the sort of basic strategy one would inherit from role models in other parts of the Government. I hope that there will be an attempt to put them into practice.

Financing, at a time of tight resources, for an expansion of activities or for that kind of monitoring enforcement is obviously difficult. Comments have been made on the possible irony that the Ministry of Defence with its Defence Exports Services Organisation uses significant amounts of taxpayers' money to promote the industry, but then finds itself constrained by the taxpayer in its control of the industry. A rebalancing might seem to be in order. I would point out, too, that export credit guarantees that are available to many people in the process of arms sales could be a source of rebalancing. That would not add stress to the budget, but change emphasis and priority.

There was a lot of discussion of progress on the multilateral front. I do not want to spend time going into that because it has been well discussed, but I would simply like to make the following comment. In the various discussions of Council of the European Union regulations on trading equipment relating to torture and capital punishment, and the worthwhile and extraordinarily necessary process of developing an international arms trade treaty, speakers have recognised how difficult it is to bring on board all the countries necessary to the standard required, which we wish to see. In looking at the Export Control Act 2002 and carrying out an internal review, can I ask the Minister not to make assumptions of the weight that international treaties will carry or provide? We must ensure that we are doing the maximum as a country within the boundaries of our own law, and if we have the opportunity to make changes later because international treaties and international enforcement have moved forward, all well and good. But let us not be lax on our side in the expectation and hope that the international community will move faster than it has in the past.

There were some discussions in the context of resources about the role of the Committee. Being very new to this, I noted with some amusement the slight irritation that seemed to be in the Government's reply to the report regarding their expenditure to support the Committee's activities and to respond to scrutiny. I do not think that the reply itself could have cost much in time and energy. It was a brief, almost cursory, reply. I assume that it was done with the expectation that the Minister would be present for the debate, speak and fill out the answers much more extensively. I look forward to that.

The potential of the Committee and Parliament to serve in a scrutinising role should not be understated. It is not just a case of reinforcing current activities. My team and I would support an expansion of those roles. In countries such as the Netherlands, the United States and Sweden, parliamentarians assist in the scrutiny of key, sensitive licences. If we remember that the Quadripartite Committee's origin is essentially in Sir Richard Scott's work on arms sales to Iraq, we can see the potential for a Committee to add a great deal to the strength and effectiveness of the overall scrutiny, control and management of arms exports. I encourage the Government to reconsider that role. Where it has been effective in other countries, why should we not take that model, learn from it and maximise its use in this country?

As others have said, the focus of this debate and all Quadripartite Committee work is on end use. The Minister has heard numerous concerns about the way in which small arms, military vehicles or vehicles that can be adapted to become military vehicles seem to find their way with amazing persistence to trouble spots throughout the globe, even though they originate from, or their parent company is based in, the UK. Given that experience and the risk of conflict that we face in a world where low-level conflict has the hideous potential to escalate into something much larger, I hope that the Government will consider how they can act on that range of issues.

Others have spoken about Uzbekistan and the exceptional appearance of Land Rover vehicles there in the midst of conflict. I received from Oxfam a few days ago—perhaps others will have seen it, too—reports about how Land Systems OMC, a South African subsidiary of the British company BAE Systems appeared to have sold by one route or another Mamba armoured vehicles to the Ugandan Government ahead of last week's controversial elections. At the same time as the Secretary of State for International Development reduced aid to Uganda because of its violation of human rights and the behaviour of its Government, we provided them with equipment to suppress Opposition parties during the country's own elections. Oxfam said:

"The lack of international controls on the arms trade is making a mockery of national arms laws."

Oxfam cites the Ugandan example and points out that the situation could not occur under US law. As a US subsidiary company, the entity would have been subject to US export controls. To be in a situation in which manufacturing through a UK subsidiary gives an opportunity, not available through a US subsidiary, to provide arms to an area that none of us should wish to see receive one additional weapon in such sensitive times must surely make us focus on how to close those loopholes. Although, like many others, I am cautious about the use of extra-territorial powers, when examining its possibilities, we must prioritise that area. Global trade has changed and the arms trade with it.

I have very much appreciated the opportunity to hear the various points of view. I look forward to the Minister's response and to the opportunity to attend many more of these debates to see where we progress. My great hope is that if I am fortunate to be standing here a year from now, the discussion will be very different and we will be adding yet more congratulations to the Government on their effectiveness at arms export control.

4.45 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) would normally have replied to this debate, but he is travelling abroad on official business. In the spirit of the Quadripartite Committee, the Opposition, in their seamless way, have substituted me to reply on their behalf.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer), who was making her first speech from her party's Front Bench on these issues. I also congratulate the Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), on the way he opened the debate. It has been wide ranging and excellent.

Before I move on to my remarks about the Committee's report, it is worth saying that the defence export industry is good for this country. It is critical for supplying our own armed forces, and it creates a lot of economic wealth and jobs throughout our country. The economies of scale of exports mean that we can supply our armed forces more effectively, help to defend our allies, and use our influence as providers of defence exports throughout the world, as well as our leverage if a friendly nation becomes less friendly.

None the less, defence export manufacturers recognise that it is in our own interests to have a robust and transparent export control regime. Since we in this country have strict controls, it is also welcome if we can ensure that those with whom we compete abide by similar rules, so that our defence manufacturers have a level playing field. They recognise that we have some of the toughest export control regulations for defence equipment in the world. That is absolutely right, and the Opposition support it.

The hon. Member for Kingswood alluded to the following remarks about the Committee's work. First, one of the Government's favourite claims is that they are joined up. On joined-upness, Parliament set a good example by having a Quadripartite Committee that brings together four policy areas that play and link together. Throughout the world, we see the impact of foreign policy, international development, defence and trade and industry, so the Committee's establishment was praiseworthy and sensible, and I hope we build on it. It is disappointing that the Government are not quite as good at being joined-up as Parliament is. The report contains some grumbles—I do not want to make too much of them—that the Government were not as seamless in delivering to the Committee as the Committee would have hoped.

I hope that the Minister elaborates on the steps that the Government have taken. I am specifically thinking of comments about the Export Control Organisation. The Foreign Secretary, who is the lead Minister, was asked questions about that, and he was not able to answer them. In response, he gave the impression that it was another Department's responsibility. If the Committee is to add value, the Government should ensure that whichever Minister speaks to it has done the appropriate work beforehand and can speak on behalf of all his colleagues—the Government, not just the Foreign Office. That would be a helpful step forward that the Committee, I am sure, would welcome.

Secondly, and more importantly, the hon. Member for Kingswood made the point about scrutiny at policy level and, as I have noted, the Committee's scrutiny of a sample of individual licences. I agree with the Committee that its work on both those aspects is valuable. I am disturbed by the fact that the Government response to the report seems to warn the Committee off being too questioning and busy because of the cost and burden of answering questions.

I have never bought the idea that Members and Select Committees asking lots of questions costs the Government any money at all. Civil servants exist and they are all paid, and I would rather have them spend their time answering questions from Members and Committees than invent weird and wacky schemes for spending our money on something else. If the Committee asks more questions, that does not necessarily impose a burden on the Government at all. We should not stand in the way of a Committee that is generally acknowledged to be doing a good job of scrutinising policy and specific licensing applications. The Government should be doing everything they can to support the Committee's work. They should not be saying that it should be less scrupulous with a view to saving costs.

I do not want to stray off the subject, but there are worrying signs from the Government in other areas where there is a tendency to try to reduce the ability of the House to scrutinise the Government. I am thinking particularly of the Leader of the House and discussions about trying to restrict the ability of Members of Parliament to ask written questions. I hope that we are not picking up on a trend on the part of the Government. Parliament should be able to scrutinise the Government, and the Government should not try to put Parliament off. I therefore very much support what the Committee Chairman said.

The hon. Member for Kingswood also touched on the Export Control Organisation, as did the hon. Member for Richmond Park. The way we work out how to fund and staff that organisation should be driven by the objectives. We should not set the organisation objectives and then give it unrealistic budget and staffing targets. We have to decide how important something is and then fund it appropriately. It is perfectly proper for the Government to have efficiency targets and to ensure that the ECO uses taxpayers' money efficiently, but they can drive that process too far, and we have heard concerns about that. In the spirit of joined-up government, the ECO needs to be properly resourced, and we need to have a clear understanding of the resources that Revenue and Customs devotes to that work.

The hon. Member for Kingswood alluded to the work of Mark Thomas. In evidence to the Committee on 31 January, published in transcript HC 873-i, he drew attention to the regulatory impact assessment done by the ECO in 2002 of the extra costs that the new regulations would mean for Revenue and Customs. It estimated that the costs would be between £200,000 and £300,000, which seems an extraordinarily small sum. Mark Thomas drew attention to the contrast with the additional £90 million that the Government announced, rightly, just the year before to target and work on drug and people trafficking.

Those issues are equally important. If we are spending £90 million on stopping drug and people trafficking, it seems unrealistic to spend only £200,000 or £300,000 on enforcing the controls that we are discussing. After all, if we do not do things properly, defence exports could go to parts of the world—Sudan was mentioned—where we, as part of either NATO or the EU, end up having to go to sort the problems out, and at much more significant cost, which we do not want to have to do.

The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) drew attention to the arms embargo on China and the extent to which the EU code of conduct can replace it. I, too, have picked up on that issue. The Committee recommended that the Government should oppose lifting the arms embargo on China unless all EU member states give an absolute assurance that that would not lead to a qualitative or quantitative increase in their exports. We could debate the extent to which we would trust such assurances from all 25 EU member states, particularly given that some seem keen to lift the arms embargo.

Furthermore, if lifting the arms embargo will not lead to a quantitative or qualitative increase in exports, there does not seem to be a particularly good reason for lifting it. That echoes the hon. Gentleman's point. If lifting the embargo will have no practical effect, it does not seem to be worth doing, and even if it had no practical effect, it would certainly send an unhelpful message. We need to consider the steps that China is taking in building a professional and well resourced army and armed forces, and the impact that they may have in that part of the world. There are a number of significant issues, and a number of our allies are concerned, as to the power of China in that area.

Mention was made of the international arms trade treaty, which the Government have been working on. It is supported by the relevant non-governmental organisations, which the hon. Member for Kingswood mentioned, and by the Defence Manufacturers Association. It takes the view that, as the rules agreed internationally would be unlikely to be tougher than ours because we have one of the stronger regimes, an effective international arms trade treaty would, if anything, mean a more level playing field worldwide. Our companies, which are bound by properly tough export licences, could compete on an even playing field with countries that perhaps do not impose such sensible controls. That is worth working for.

It would be helpful, as has been said, if the Minister informed us of the level that the negotiations have reached and perhaps the future time line. One specific question is important, and this is true of all international treaties: who would sign it? A good example in that regard is the Kyoto treaty. Unfortunately, because some significant players around the world such as the US and the developing countries did not sign up to that international treaty, it will not have the impact it could have had. The same will be true of the arms trade treaty, as other hon. Members have said.

If only those who already have relatively robust export controls sign the treaty, and if we capture all the significant defence manufacturing and exporting countries but fail to capture the countries that are growing their defence manufacturing and exporting businesses, we shall only give them a business opportunity, handicap our own industries and lower the general control across the world. We will not move the situation any further forward. It would therefore be interesting to know the strategy that the Government are undertaking to maximise the number of countries that sign the treaty.

We must also consider how the treaty would be enforced, because without robust enforcement it would not be effective. As with all these things, we know that countries such as ours will follow the rules and implement the measures robustly, but we will find that the countries that give us problems are not enforcing them. Unless there is a robust enforcement mechanism that cannot be subject to a veto by the Security Council, there might be a problem, given that one or two countries that we have mentioned, and which would need to be bound by the measure, are on the Security Council and have a veto as we do.

It would be interesting if the Minister summarised the substantive progress that the Government managed to make during their presidency of the G8 and the EU. Having looked at the communiqués and the agreements that came out of their two periods in the chair, I know that the words were relatively encouraging, but it is really a question of how much substantive action will be taken. The problem is always that we get the communiqués and they contain nice words, but we do not know by how much we have moved forward. It would be helpful to have some detail on that.

As has been said, the EU did not make any progress on agreeing an update to the EU code of conduct on arms exports. From what the hon. Member for Ilford, South said, it seems that one reason for those discussions not taking place might be that the Government wanted to keep the arms embargo on China off the agenda. Perhaps that has indeed held up discussions on the EU code of conduct. It would be helpful if the Minister outlined the plans of the Government or of the current EU presidency for making progress on the code of conduct, and when we can expect significant developments.

I have touched on the importance of and the need for enforcement. One subject not touched on in this debate, but mentioned briefly as an outstanding issue in the Committee's report, is technology transfer. The flip side to our exports is the need to ensure that there can be appropriate technology transfer from our allies to provide our armed forces with the best and latest technology. In a demonstration of joined-upness and working together, I would like to mention the joint strike fighter and joint combat aircraft. The United States Senate Committee on Armed Services is holding hearings at the moment.

Mike Gapes: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his role as spokesman, even if it is only temporary—at least on the issues we are discussing. Does he agree that there are worrying signs of the resurgence of protectionism in the United States? The Foreign Affairs Committee certainly picked up on that two weeks ago; we were shocked by the furore about the purchase of P&O by Dubai Ports World, which was the big story in US politics. That has ramifications throughout the defence sector. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the joint strike fighter; he could also have mentioned the failure to get a waiver on the international traffic in arms regulations. The Quadripartite Committee and many others have been pushing the Defence Committee on that issue for many years, and there seems to be no progress.

Mr. Harper: The hon. Gentleman makes the point very well.

In testimony to the Senate Committee, Lord Drayson stated the case for the Government well, particularly on the joint strike fighter. My hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) made a written submission to that Committee, making the same point, which is that it is no good the US Government fighting coalition, but buying only American. The US Government need to facilitate things for their allies, particularly their most dependable one, which is always able to join it on some more difficult missions. They really need to consider how they pay back their allies—well, it would be wrong to say "pay back", because we do not get involved in military operations for that reason, but when we are participating in such operations with our allies, it is difficult to explain to the British public why we do not get appropriate technology transfer. When we are involved in the development of some of those projects, we do not get to keep the technological kit for our armed forces up to the mark.

The Dubai Ports World episode is particularly worrying, because the ports concerned were already owned by a foreign company, P&O. They were simply changing hands from one foreign owner to another. It is worrying that the US politicians making a fuss about it seemed not to be able to distinguish between those countries in the middle east that are our allies and are supportive, and those that are not.

Perhaps it is just that there are mid-term elections coming up in the US—unfortunately, there are always mid-term elections coming up, so that is not a very helpful sign—or simply that the knowledge of those making the fuss is not sufficiently robust with regard to those parts of the world. However, it is worrying in itself if those politicians cannot distinguish between those nations that are supportive of our foreign policy goals and those that are not. There are worrying signs of that kind, so it is helpful that the Government and the Opposition—and the various Committees—can join together and present a united front on such subjects.

On that point—celebrating the joined-upness of Parliament, Government and Opposition in sometimes lobbying together on those issues—I draw my remarks to a close. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

5.4 pm

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): It has been a real pleasure to serve under your chairmanship during this important debate, Sir John. We have heard a number of excellent speeches. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper)—the stand-in for the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown)—for the effective way in which he made his points. I also welcome the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) to her new role. She made a very good contribution. Of course, my hon. Friends the Members for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) always make perceptive and thoughtful comments. We are grateful for the work of the Quadripartite Committee and for the professional way in which it conducts its tasks.

First, I emphasise that the Government believe strongly in the need for robust and transparent export controls. That is clearly reflected in the effort that we have put into our domestic legislation, the Export Control Act 2002, which was the first major legislative development on the subject since 1939. We have done more than ever before to provide more and better information to Parliament and the public on the licensing decisions that we make and the policy that underpins them. The same approach underpins what we do internationally to promote a properly regulated and responsible global trade in defence equipment. We also took the leading role in pressing for an international arms trade treaty, which we want negotiated by the United Nations.

The Government welcome the high level of scrutiny that the Quadripartite Committee has applied to strategic export controls. We value our dialogue with the Committee and believe that its constructive criticism has played a full part in ensuring that the UK's export controls system continues to be recognised as one of the most effective and transparent in the world. The Quadripartite Committee arrangement is perhaps unique amongst parliamentary Committees, but Parliament's joined-up approach on the issue mirrors the joined-up approach that the Government have worked hard to establish across those Whitehall Departments with an interest in export controls. Export control is one of the best examples of joined-up government across Governments internationally. Our arrangements are excellent examples of the benefits that joined-up working can deliver. We fully support the continuation of the Quadripartite Committee system.

We do not always see eye to eye with the Committee on its recommendations. We will continue to take a different view on, for example, the publication of end-user details, where there are real issues of confidentiality for companies and clients, and on calls for the Committee to have prior scrutiny of licence applications. We maintain that it is for the Government to take the export licence decisions and for Parliament to scrutinise the policy and decisions retrospectively.

However, we have shown our commitment to going as far as we can to meet the Committee's request for enhanced scrutiny. We have introduced quarterly reporting on licensing decisions, as that allows for much earlier scrutiny of decisions. The data published are as current as three months old and no older than six months. We also provide the Committee, on a confidential basis, with enhanced information on countries of particular concern. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood welcomed that in his introductory remarks.

Our annual report on strategic export controls has long been held up as a prime example of open government at work. However, there is no doubt that the publication of additional and more frequent information means that we have to revisit the role, format and delivery of the annual report. The Government are committed to working closely with Parliament, non-governmental organisations, industry and other stakeholders to ensure that the report continues to address key needs while also taking into account the changing dynamics. We welcome the Committee's submissions on that subject.

I shall address hon. Members' points about organisation, resources and enforcement, and then I shall talk a little about export control policy issues, before moving on to the EU-China arms embargo and the arms trade treaty. Then I shall make my concluding comments.

Concerns have been expressed about organisational issues, but I should say from a Foreign and Commonwealth Office perspective that we have made changes to how we handle applications. We have transferred resources to bolster our export licensing team and ensure that licence applications continue to be given the priority and close scrutiny that they deserve. Performance is exceeding the targets set.

The licensing process covers four Departments and collectively we continue to meet and surpass challenging targets for service quality and delivery. That indicates that the system is well geared to meeting the challenges now and in future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood mentioned the issue raised in the report of the resource implications of the Quadripartite Committee's questions. Perhaps our response was not as felicitously worded as it could have been. I certainly want to see the Committee doing its job properly. If it needs to ask a large number of questions, it should ask them and we should provide timely answers.

Roger Berry: I welcome that statement, which the Minister has put on the record. I am grateful. It has certainly responded to our concerns about past Government statements. I am delighted that the days of moaning over that matter have gone.

Ian Pearson: I also want to offer reassurance to the hon. Member for Richmond Park, who raised the issue of whether there were still plans to privatise the Export Control Organisation. The Department of Trade and Industry looked closely at outsourcing some ECO work, but concluded that the case for such a move had not been made. I think that that decision was right. As a Government, we are fully committed to an effective and efficient export control regime, and we will not do anything to undermine that.

In a typically robust contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said that we ought to abolish the Defence Export Services Organisation. I tell him in all honesty that I do not think there is anything inconsistent or immoral in there being an organisation such as DESO that helps UK exporters of defence equipment. Surely all countries have the right to defend themselves. Tens of thousands of UK jobs depend on the defence export industry and having a responsible licensing system and an effective marketing organisation is entirely consistent. We need to have both.

I move on to the points raised about enforcement. I stress that Customs checks are based very much on intelligence and risk. Revenue and Customs has a dedicated team that works closely with the intelligence agencies. It evaluates intelligence, sets profiles to target consignments and destinations of concern, checks all significant allegations and intelligence and will mount a formal investigation when it suspects a deliberate breach involving a sensitive destination or particularly sensitive goods. We believe that in many cases it is more appropriate to disrupt activity before any offence is committed. HMRC has a good record of disrupting potential illicit activity. The Quad Committee will know that, because it has talked to HMRC about its work on this issue.

End-use monitoring was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood. I am sure that he knows this, but I stress again that the Government assess the end use for a particular export before granting a licence in the first place. That includes an assessment of the risk of diversion, and in a minute I shall say more about that in respect of the specific examples raised. If we believe that there is a risk that the goods will be diverted, we will not issue a licence. For that reason, we do not generally impose end-use monitoring requirements on particular exports.

Mr. Harper: I want to pick up on the HMRC issue. A point alluded to today was made specifically by the hon. Member for Kingswood in the article he published in the Select Committee supplement of The House Magazine. He wrote:

"Revenue and Customs rarely publish details of actions they have taken against non-compliant companies and individuals. Why is it that we learn more about alleged breaches in arms controls from investigative journalists?"

I appreciate that because of legal and court actions, there may be times when HMRC cannot publicise things—certainly not in a timely way. However, transparency in the effectiveness of enforcement is the flip side of the coin of transparency in how the export regime works, and would make everybody more confident that a robust regime was in place.

Ian Pearson: I tried to explain that the focus of HMRC's work is targeted primarily at disruption and acting at an early stage. As a matter of rule, it does not want to go to the press and publicise such things, but it is an effective organisation. However, I pay tribute to investigative journalists such as Mark Thomas—if he wants a job with HMRC, I shall see whether that can be arranged.

I move on to some of the issues raised about specific policy concerns. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Richmond Park recognised that the issue of extra-territorial controls was sensitive. Under the new legislation, such controls apply to brokering in torture equipment, long-range missiles, arms to embargo destinations and intangible transfers, and technical assistance related to weapons of mass destruction. However, we share the hon. Lady's concerns about conflicts of jurisdiction relating to extra-territorial controls. The scope for such controls, including the goods covered, will be reviewed as part of the three-year review. I give my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood the assurance he seeks: we will look again at that issue.

The Export Control Act 2002 introduced controls on the brokering of all equipment on the UK's military list, including MANPADS—man-portable air defence systems—rocket-propelled grenades and automatic light weapons, when any part of the activity takes place in the UK. That represents a significant step in helping to prevent the UK from being used as a base for undesirable arms transfers. Again, I give the assurance that in 2007 we will review whether new categories of goods should be added to the restrictive goods category of the trade control orders.

A number of Members raised the issue of the export of Land Rovers to Uzbekistan and my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood went into some detail. Our understanding is that the Turkish Government gifted the vehicles to the Uzbek Government under a joint counter-terrorism agreement. We believe that the vehicles were not Land Rover-approved products. As my hon. Friend rightly said, Octar, the Turkish company, added its own products and components before selling the vehicles to the Turkish Government under its own name. Under the EC dual-use regulations and our domestic legislation, the UK has no power to control the export of civilian-specification Land Rovers. The export of civilian vehicles converted by a Turkish company using its own technology, without UK involvement, is a matter for Turkish rather than UK export controls. If we were to seek to control civil Land Rovers, we would have to seek control of all off-road-capable 4x4 vehicles. That does not seem practical to the Government. We are willing to consider, with the Committee, ideas that it might have in this regard and in regard to the enforceable limits of our jurisdiction. I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that we will listen—[Interruption.]—I am just about to do so.

Mike Gapes: The Minister made reference to the European Union code, but Turkey is a member of NATO. Are there any restrictions as part of NATO agreements on military co-operation by NATO countries whereby the fact that Turkey has given equipment to Uzbekistan in this way might become a matter that could be discussed within NATO channels?

Ian Pearson: I do not know the answer to that question, so it would be best for me to write to my hon. Friend on that issue.

Another specific issue concerned subsidiaries. One particular case mentioned was the selling of armoured vehicles to Uganda. The situation there is that were the company in question in the United Kingdom to have taken any part in the deal, this would have been caught by the UK's trade controls. It is the same situation as I described earlier. Exports from South Africa undertaken with no UK involvement are rightly a matter solely for the South African Government and their export licensing regime.

Specifically on subsidiaries, the UK's trade controls apply to any person in the United Kingdom and any UK person anywhere in the world undertaking any act calculated to promote the overseas trade in military list equipment to embargoed destinations and the overseas trade in long-range missiles and torture goods to any destination. The provisions apply to a UK person directing a company overseas or having any part to play in such a deal. Restrictions are in place. Again, as part of the review, we will examine whether there are grounds for extending them. It would be misleading for anybody to go away from this debate without recognising that with subsidiaries there are issues when we are talking about UK nationals.

I want to finish discussing this issue and to deal with the point made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) about Transnistria. My understanding of that situation is that there has been no UK national involvement. As a result, it is difficult to see how the UK has any locus in being able to influence what is happening there, which, judging by his comments is illegal activity. We would like all countries to have the high standards and export control procedures that we have in the UK. We encourage other countries to raise their game, but we cannot force them to do so and there is no international mechanism to make them do so.

Roger Berry: If we are talking about a situation where a UK company deliberately sets out to flout the laws restricting arms exports by creating a subsidiary in another country for the express purpose of getting round the controls that the Minister rightly takes credit for, is that not a problem that needs to be addressed? In the case of Ashok Leyland, if the Government believe it is right to be able to stop the exports of arms to Sudan because there is a UN embargo, what is the logic that says it is perfectly okay and it is of no interest to us whatsoever if it flogs arms to every other country in Africa?

Ian Pearson: The short answer is that I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. The issue of extraterritoriality needs to be addressed. When it comes to having control of goods going to embargoed destinations and of long-range missiles or torture goods, export licences are still required at the moment.

Sir John Stanley: Does the Minister not agree that the significance of the Transdniester case was the demonstration of the extreme ease with which an individual could get into serious contractual negotiations about major mass-killer weapons?

Ian Pearson: I take that well-made point, which shows the difficulty of the task that we face globally in trying to stop proliferation of such weapons. It is a clear indication of the need for an international arms trade treaty, to which I shall refer in a moment.

I shall now discuss the points that have been raised about torture. As hon. Members will be aware, the EU regulation on the import and export of torture equipment has been adopted and comes into force on 30 July. It is directly applicable to the UK, so we will be drafting an amendment order implementing it in the UK. It is intended that we bring the provisions into force in the UK at the same time as the regulation comes into force. We are confident that the trade regulation covering torture equipment will allow us to maintain the high level of control that the UK already has in place for such equipment. We have negotiated derogations from the legislation that make it possible for us to maintain our national export prohibitions where we wish.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood raised the issue of sting sticks and thumb cuffs. We will work with other member states and the Commission to introduce additional equipment for control under the legislation, where appropriate and necessary. We have led the way in this field internationally. I can assure him that we will continue to do so.

The common position on brokering does not apply to goods controlled under the trade regulation covering torture equipment, but to arms as defined by the EU common military list. However, I can again assure hon. Members that the UK will continue to apply trade control restrictions to goods covered by the regulation. We would encourage other states to do the same. This is an issue of national competence rather than Community competence. Again, we are leading the way nationally in terms of our regulations and we want to encourage other countries to act in the same way.

We do not believe that a register for brokers is necessarily the most appropriate method of controlling brokering activity. Our approach is to license the export, not the individual. The UK supports the group of Government experts on brokering, which we hope will be set up as soon as possible after the UN 2006 review conference and will result in an open-ended working group with a view to establishing a fully transparent, open and legally binding brokering instrument.

I want to discuss the EU-China arms embargo, which was raised in some detail by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South. The basic situation is that a review of it was announced by the European Council in December 2003 and is ongoing. In June 2005, the European Council recalled the conclusions reached at the December 2004 European Council to continue to work towards lifting the embargo. No deadline has been set. In response to some of the questions, may I say that China has not helped itself in this regard by enacting the anti-secession law? It would be helpful if the Chinese Government were to make visible progress on human rights issues to create an atmosphere in which it might be possible for other relevant discussions to take place.

To refer to a point made by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean, we do not believe that the lifting of the embargo could lead to increased tensions in the region. The European Council conclusions of December 2004 recorded the importance of the criteria of the code of conduct in Europe's arms controls. The code includes provisions regarding stability and security in the region, and the national security of friendly and allied countries. The Government recognise that China's neighbours and others have a legitimate and understandable interest both in the effectiveness of the EU system of arms control and the stability of the east Asian region. However, the European Council underlined the fact that the result of any decision on the embargo should not be an increase in arms exports from EU member states to China in either quantitative or qualitative terms. We will not approve exports to the region if they would have a significant adverse effect on regional stability. That includes the potential for equipment significantly to enhance the effectiveness of existing capabilities or to improve false projection.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South also raised the issue of the toolbox.

Mr. Harper: Will the Minister give way?

Ian Pearson: Let me explain about the toolbox first. The toolbox is a set of measures that member states will use with post-embargo destinations. Crucially, it will oblige member states to share information in detail—and frequently—about licences that they have recently granted for any country emerging from an EU arms embargo; that is a good thing. The document is not yet agreed, but we hope that it will be soon—and, certainly, before any decision is taken on whether to lift the China embargo.

Mr. Harper: I am still at a loss in respect of lifting the arms embargo. Given the reasons for imposing the embargo on China in the first place and the fact that the Minister has restated that the Government and the EU do not want there to be an increase, qualitatively or quantitatively, in arms exports, and also given that he said that the code of conduct would also prohibit that if it were going to damage the interests of our allies, I am at a loss to see what the purpose is of lifting the arms embargo. The Minister has explained that the European Council has stuck to its position that it wants to work towards lifting it, but I cannot see any benefit for Britain, the EU or the wider western world in doing so. Can the Minister help us to see the purpose and benefit to Britain of lifting the arms embargo on China? Why would we want to continue with that process?

Ian Pearson: The merits—or otherwise—of lifting the arms embargo are still being discussed and a range of factors will be taken into account. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that if we consider the EU code of conduct and what is likely to come out of the discussions on the toolbox, it is clear that there will still be an effective licensing regime. The European Council's conclusions were very much that they did not want there to be an increase in arms exports in quantitative or qualitative terms, and that remains its position.

Mike Gapes: I am pleased that the Minister tells me that there is progress on the toolbox. Can he tell us whether he feels that the Austrian presidency of the EU will accelerate the momentum of that progress, and whether he has a sense that the Austrian or Finnish presidencies will wish to conclude the decisions about lifting the arms embargo on China this year or will it be a longer-term process?

Ian Pearson: Some of those issues are a matter for the Austrian presidency, but I can say that there is a general desire to make progress with the toolbox. There is no timetable for making a decision on the embargo and no deadlines are set, but discussions are still going on and they will undoubtedly continue.

I welcome the Committee's support for the arms trade treaty and the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South and the hon. Member for Richmond Park. International support has been growing following the UK's clear backing of the initiative for an arms trade treaty on the trade of all conventional arms, aimed at ending irresponsible transfers. In March 2005, the Foreign Secretary gave strong backing to that and we are leading the world.

In terms of progress, we used our EU presidency to secure Council conclusions in October giving full support to such a treaty and to the launch of UN-based negotiations to that end at the earliest opportunity. That was one of many significant achievements of the UK's presidency. At the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Malta in November we secured positive language in support of work on such a treaty to commence at the UN. Commonwealth support is important because it demonstrates that a wide cross-section of countries—developed and developing, exporters and importers—recognise the importance of such a treaty. These are all-important steps in building momentum. We are committed to securing a UN-based process and we will continue to build support for agreement to that at the UN General Assembly First Committee meeting this autumn. The UN process will ensure that all the key players are engaged, which is essential if an arms trade treaty is to work. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean stressed the importance of involving all the key players, and we recognise that. However, we should also recognise that we have a long way to go in terms of bringing everybody on board. Progress is being made and support is being built but, realistically, it will be a number of years before a treaty is in place.

We are discussing this initiative with a broad range of partners. We are committed to securing a strong treaty that includes all the major arms exporters. We are having discussions with the United States, China and Russia, as well as with others. I will make a trade visit to China next month, and one of the topics I want to raise with my counterpart will be Chinese support for an arms trade treaty.

To conclude, let me stress again that export controls are a vital part of our foreign policy. I also wish to emphasise the context in which we make decisions about export controls. In many respects, the decisions we make are a manifestation of our assessment of particular destinations and regions at the time when an application is made, but we should not lose sight of the fact that they are one strand of a much wider effort to change the behaviour of countries about which we have concerns—for example, in terms of their human rights record or their own export control policies.

This week, in addition to this debate, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy has given evidence to the Quadripartite Committee in his capacity as the Minister responsible for the Export Control Organisation at the Department of Trade and Industry. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will again appear before the Committee on 25 April to contribute to further scrutiny and oversight. That gives a flavour of the high level of scrutiny applied to this area of policy and the importance that the Government attach to it.

Exports of military equipment is an emotive topic and we are all aware of the untold misery that the illicit or irresponsible trade in conventional arms can inflict on some of the most vulnerable people of the world, but we also accept that states have a right to invest in their own security and self-defence. I want to assure Members that the Government will continue to assess rigorously applications for export licences from the UK and to make sure that our exports continue to be a model for others. We shall also continue our efforts internationally to establish binding standards for the responsible trade in commercial arms.
